This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

+ Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.

+ Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.

+ Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.

+ Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at `http://books.google.com/`

BALLAD.

By WILFORD MORGAN.

Price 4s.

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

"This composition is, in all respects, worthy of its predecessor, 'My sweetheart when a boy.' It is simple in structure, and within the means of every amateur; but its music is pleasing, and thoroughly appropriate to the words. No doubt the song will soon win a share of public favour."—Musical World.

"Mr Wilford Morgan's song, 'Her I love,' will be certain to find many admirers for the musicianly instinct which pervades it, as well as for the happy manner in which the very pretty melody has been laid out for the voice."—Morning Post.

"LITTLE BIRDIE, SING TO ME."

SONG.

Words by Miss S. P. HOWELL.

Music by WILFORD MORGAN,

Price 4s.

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street.

"A naïve little song for a young girl is 'Little birdie, sing to me,' composed by Wilford Morgan. There is a melodious ring in this song that will please the ear."—Graphic.

"Mr Wilford Morgan's latest production, 'Little birdie, sing to me,' apparently aims at simplicity of melody and accompaniment, and has happily hit it."—Morning Post.

"'LITTLE BIRDIE, SING TO ME.'—Mr Wilford Morgan has just published another very pleasing song under the above title. It is a very fresh, bright melody, which might almost be signed Mendelssohn; and the accompaniment, while sufficient to sustain the voice, is extremely easy."—Era.

"A charming song, full of melody and sweetness, without being difficult to singers of moderate compass."—Hornet.

"From Messrs Duncan Davison & Co. we have a song by the well-known vocalist, Mr Wilford Morgan, 'Little birdie, sing to me,' a remarkably good and characteristic setting of some pretty, simple words."—Echo.

"A tuneful and pleasing ballad for a voice of average compass, effectively harmonized, although the pianoforte accompaniment presents but very few difficulties to the performer. 'Little birdie' contains all the elements of popularity, and should eventually become as popular as the composer's 'My sweetheart when a boy.'"—Sunday Times.

"A LOVER'S SONG."

A LOVER'S SONG. Composed expressly for, and sung by, Mr VERNON RIGBY. The Poetry by EDWARD COPPING. The Music by LOUIS DIEHL (Composer of "The Mariner," &c.). "Mr Vernon Rigby next reappeared, and sang 'A Lover's Song,' expressly composed for him by Louis Diehl. Both the words and music of the song are simple, and they received ample justice from the singer. An encore was demanded, and Mr Rigby repeated the last verse."—Birmingham Daily Post. "We must compliment Mr Rigby on his rendering of "A Lover's Song." This charming melody, by Louis Diehl, is worthy of Mendelssohn himself, and Mr Rigby seemed to catch the exact feeling without overdoing it."—Manchester Evening News. Price 4s. SIR JULIUS BENEDICT AT THE FIFTH GÜRZENICH CONCERT, COLOGNE.

The concert commenced, under the direction of Dr Ferdinand Hiller, Stadt-Capellmeister, with Beethoven's overture to Coriolan, played with great dash and spirit. Then followed a Pianoforte Concerto, by Edward Grieg. This composer, now introduced for the first time to the public of Cologne, was born in 1843 at Bergen, in Norway, where his father was consul. He studied at the Leipsic Conservatory, whence he was compelled, by illness, to return home, in 1862. He now resides at Christiana, in which town he has founded and directs a musical society, and so highly is he esteemed that the Norwegian Parliament have granted him a pension, in order that he may devote himself entirely to art, and not have his energies paralysed by want of pecuniary means. His Concerto gave general satisfaction. M. Brassin, of Brussels, performed with thorough mastery the extremely difficult pianoforte part. Mdlle Aglaia Orgeni sang the scena and air: "Wo bin ich? Unglückliche Alceste!" from Gluck's great work; "Stille Liebe," by Schumann: "Haideröslein," by Schubert; and a "Mazurka," by Chopin, with French words: "Aime moi," adapted to it by Louis Pomey. The young lady was not particularly successful in the excerpt from Gluck's opera, but was much applauded in the detached songs. The chorus sang two "Christmas Songs," a Capella, by Leonhard Schröter, 1587, and M. Brassin again took his place at the piano, this time for the purpose of treating his hearers to the "Fantasia über Ungarische Volksmelodien," by the Abbate Franz Liszt.

But the great attraction of the evening was undoubtedly the first appearance here of Sir Julius Benedict. The Kölner Zeitung says:—

"The fifth and last concert for the year 1874 introduced to the Cologne public an interesting and celebrated individual, Sir Julius Benedict, from London, who, as we read a short time since, would celebrate on the 24th inst. his 70th birthday (he was born on the 24th December, 1804), had not been deterred by the discomfort attending the passage of the English Channel in winter from coming over to conduct in person his G minor Symphony at the Gürzenich, and seizing the opportunity to become acquainted with our concert arrangements, our orchestra, and our public. An expression of eager curiosity was mirrored on every face, as, at the conclusion of the First Part of the concert, a slim figure, with white hair, white moustache, and pleasing features, and with various high orders decorating his breast, advancing briskly to the conductor's seat, grasped the conductor's stick. This was Sir Julius Benedict, Knight, the musical prince of London, and the founder of the celebrated Monday Popular Concerts, where German music is cultivated more assiduously than anywhere else in England. This was the man whose kindly aid in a foreign land, and whose hospitable house, are known probably to every German artist who has visited England. In fact, the interest evinced by the public was necessarily directed as much to the man as to the composer; the sympathetic reception which greeted the veteran, even before a note of his music had been heard, was a tribute due from the German public to the promoter and propagator of German music in proud Albion."

"Julius Benedict has written numerous operas and works for the piano. Of the former, only a few have become known in Germany, and, for this reason, we are unable from personal knowledge to pronounce an opinion on them. His Symphony in G minor, first produced last year, if we have been correctly informed, at the Crystal Palace, displays the same touches of bonhomie which characterize the entire man. Benedict cultivates and fosters in England modern music as well as the works of his favourite period, but he does not often admit the former into the sanctuary of his home, or of his own productivity. To the music in which he grew up and was educated his Symphony proves he has remained true. His creation is raised upon the forms and tints of the period immediately following Beethoven; hence its clear, intelligible language; its agreeable, rounded contour, and its pleasing colour. No struggle with existence, no inward suffering, has clouded Benedict's musical soul; his Symphony reflects only kindly and harmonious thought and feeling, and enviable Olympian merriment. The youthful elasticity with which Sir Julius Benedict wielded the conducting-stick was something wonderful. The strict and decided marking of the time, as well as the plain embodiment of the inward thought in the outward gesture, should be taken as a model by every youthful aspirant to the post of conductor. Benedict is decidedly a genial conductor, who inspires and warms the performers, and the latter, throwing their soul into their task, executed his work in a brilliant manner. Animated applause greeted the conclusion of each of the four movements, and, at the end of the whole, the veteran composer was the object of a perfect ovation."

"The First Part was brought to a close by a new Symphony of Julius Benedict's. The composer had crossed the Channel on purpose to undertake the direction of his work himself. Benedict, though no longer young, is probably known to the majority of our readers only by name, as he has passed most of his life abroad. He was born, in 1804, at Stuttgart. For the piano, he was a pupil of Hummel, while no less a person than C. M. von Weber was his master in composition. For a long time Benedict was a theatrical conductor in Vienna and Naples. He wrote a whole series of operas, partly in the style of Rossini, and partly in that of Weber—so says our authority. We ourselves never had an opportunity of hearing any of them. Benedict at present lives in London, highly esteemed as a pianist, a composer, and a 'conductor,' for so is a Capellmeister called in English. He shares with the Italian Costa the musical supremacy of the British Isles. Queen Victoria has conferred on our countryman the dignity of Knighthood, an unusual mark of distinction for a foreign musician to receive.* The Cologne public greeted very warmly Sir Julius Benedict, who only recently, in the late autumn of his artistic productivity, wrote the Symphony destined for performance and dedicated to the Crown Princess Victoria. That a composer of Benedict's age should not attempt to strike out new paths is something we can easily understand, but that an artist in his seventieth year shall be capable of surprising the musical world with a vigorous, fresh, and melodious composition, is something rare, and to be regarded as a special gift of Providence. The Symphony, as a rule, belongs to the period before Mendelssohn. Everything in it is pleasing, clear, and intelligible, without, however, being ordinary or commonplace. Its architectonic combination is skilful and full of good taste. The instrumentation, though mostly measured, and always agreeable to the ear, reminds one at times of the whilom theatrical conductor. The work is divided into the customary four movements. The first movement begins, as an introduction, in a broad tempo (G minor, 3-4), and leads to the principal movement, Allegro Appassionata. The second movement (B flat major), is marked Andante con moto. It is interrupted by a more animated Più mosso, and then returns to the more moderate original time. The third movement, the Scherzo (E flat major, alternately 3-4 and 6-4), is a brilliant orchestral piece. The last movement, the Finale, is exceedingly lively and brilliant, rushing along in a rolling Allegro con fuoco. The first and third movements were those which pleased us best. Among the audience, all parts of the work met with warm and continually increasing approbation, in which we, also, when so amiable an artist is concerned, joyfully share."

Speaking of the same work, on the occasion of its performance at the Second Symphonic Concert given by the Royal Saxon "Chapel," in the Gewerbehaus, Dresden, Herr Otto Bauck writes as follows in the Dresdner Journal:—

"Besides these well-known works, a Symphony (in G minor) by Julius Benedict was performed for the first time. Benedict was the most talented pupil of Karl Maria von Weber, and became likewise a true friend of the composer's family. As we all know, he has resided for a great number of years in London, where he is highly esteemed, and, as the first musical authority, exercises, with the noblest aims, an important influence upon musical matters and artistic taste. Though now in his seventieth year, his artistic activity is still as vigorous and unceasing as ever, and the fiftieth anniversary of his professional career was celebrated in London a few days ago, in a highly flattering manner. His Symphony, full of joyous animation in the first and last movement, simple, natural, and easy in its flow of thought, clear in form, and without any pretentious striving after clever eccentricities, reveals the thorough musician of nice artistic training, who, with sure and elegant technical skill in the polyphonous working out of his motives, and in his instrumental plasticity, does not turn towards the new tendencies and modes of expression of the present day, but, though without perceptibly falling back upon earlier symphonic productions, preserves an independent and peculiar treatment and mental course of his own. The first movement and the Andante, so cleverly conceived, and so admirably carried out, with its artistically interwoven and well managed parts, are the movements which stand forward most prominently and significantly. With regard to the Benedict-Jubilee mentioned above, we beg to give utterance to the sincere wish, which will undoubtedly be re-echoed in the breasts of our German brothers in art. May this worthy representative of German music abroad long be spared to continue his praiseworthy efforts in the true cause of art."

THE Milan Gazetta Musicale gives a list of thirty-five new operas produced in Italy during the past year.

THE WORCESTER MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

The Committee of Stewards of the Worcester Festival having had a final conference with the Dean and Chapter of Worcester with a view, if possible, of coming to an arrangement as to the use of Worcester Cathedral, have issued a statement setting forth the result of their deliberations. On meeting, the Committee of Stewards laid before the Dean and Chapter two alternative modes of arranging the Festival, which it was thought might meet the views of the Dean and Chapter, and they say:—"The first of these proposals was to arrange the Festival on the former plan, but modified by the concessions proposed in the last paragraph of the Stewards' first protest, viz.—1. Full Church Service on first day, with sermon. 2. Church Service for conclusion of Festival on last evening. 3. Band and performers to be on floor of transept, instead of in an orchestra. 4. Chapter to have veto on music performed. The second proposal was still more closely adapted to the supposed wishes of the Dean and Chapter—viz., to hold Divine service each morning at ten o'clock, so arranged as to be concluded by twelve, but with sermon on first day; oratorio to commence at one, secular concerts in some other place in the evening as heretofore, but with Divine service on last evening under arrangement by Chapter." The Chapter came to the conference prepared with no proposition at all; conversation occupied some time, but the "crucial test" was as to the sale of tickets, on which the Chapter would not yield. The Committee attached primary importance to—1. Entire oratorios. 2. First-rate talent. 3. Adequate funds. The Dean and Chapter admitted the necessity for funds, but suggested no mode of raising them. "The conference," therefore adds the Stewards, "became a useless ceremony." We are asked by the Mayor of Worcester to publish the following petition to the Queen in Council, which, together with one to the same effect "from the citizens of Worcester," is now in course of preparation at Worcester:—"The humble petition of the Mayor, Aldermen, and citizens of the city of Worcester in Common Council assembled on the 1st day of December, 1874, humbly showeth, that for more than 150 years musical festivals have been held alternately in the cities of Worcester, Hereford, and Gloucester, and during nearly the whole of the last 100 years, the Cathedral Churches in the said cities have, by permission of the successive Deans and Chapters thereof, been used for the performance of oratorios and other sacred music forming part of such festivals. That from nearly their first establishment these festivals have been the means of providing funds for the relief of the distressed widows and orphans of poor deceased clergymen of the three dioceses of Worcester, Hereford, and Gloucester. That oratorios and other sacred music of the highest character have at these festivals been rendered in the most perfect manner possible, and, from the associations connected with the hallowed buildings in which the festivals have been held, have produced impressions of the most refining and elevating character on the minds of the hearers. That these festivals have been very largely attended by the inhabitants of the three dioceses, and by their friends, and strangers from a distance, and have afforded opportunities for all religious sections of your Majesty's subjects to unite in religious services of praise in our ancient Cathedrals. That a world-wide celebrity has been attained by these festivals, and they have gained for the cities in which they are held honourable regard among the most enlightened of the people of this realm, and have largely tended to the encouragement and improvement of sacred music. That the festival held in the Worcester Cathedral in the year 1830 was attended by your most gracious Majesty, and all the succeeding festivals since the accession of your most gracious Majesty to the throne have been honoured with the patronage of your Majesty. That successive Bishops of the three dioceses, and Deans and Chapters of the three Cathedral Churches have from time to time given their encouragement and support to the festivals, and the present Bishop of the Diocese of Worcester has consented to become President of the festival which in the ordinary course should be held in this city in the ensuing year: that application has been made to the present Dean and Chapter of Worcester for the use of the Cathedral as heretofore for the festival of the year 1875, but the Dean and Chapter have declined to grant the use thereof, and have proposed to substitute for a festival, such as those which have so long and so satisfactorily been held in the Cathedral, religious services and sermons, which some sections of your Majesty's subjects would be unable to attend. That this decision of the Dean and Chapter has created great dissatisfaction among the people of the three dioceses, and has given rise to well-founded fears that, unless the Dean and Chapter should alter their determination, the festival will be discontinued, not only at Worcester, but also at Hereford and Gloucester, and that the interests of the charity for the support of which they have been carried on will greatly suffer, and the public will be deprived of the opportunity hitherto afforded them of hearing the grandest sacred music performed in the most effective manner in those sacred buildings in which alone such music can produce, and has produced, the most beneficial effects. That your petitioners have received the decision of the Dean and Chapter with much sorrow, and believe that a discontinuance of the use of Worcester Cathedral for the festival would tend to lower the character of this city in the estimation of enlightened and educated people, and would be not only a local but also a national loss. Your petitioners, therefore, humbly pray that your Most Gracious Majesty, as the head of the Church of this realm, will be pleased to use your influence with the Dean and Chapter of Worcester to induce them to continue to permit the holding of the triennial festivals in the Cathedral Church of this city, under such arrangements as will best promote the object in view."

MISDIRECTED SYMPATHY.

We read as follows in the New York Arcadian:—

"The public will have learnt with regret of the death of Mr Sherwood C. Campbell, which took place at Chicago on Saturday week. Mr Campbell, whose real name was Coan, was born at New Haven in the year 1839. At an early age he began to develop a fine voice, but the opportunities of coming before the public in the better styles of music were then very few, and Mr Campbell went into the minstrel business, and was successively in the Campbell, Christy, and Backus troupes. After having visited Australia as a member of the last organization, he was engaged, on his return to this country, in Mr Layfayette Harrison's English Opera Company. Subsequently he was attached to the Caroline Richings Troupe, and when Parepa-Rosa formed her company, Mr Campbell enlisted under her banner. It was during this engagement that he achieved his greatest successes, and so much did Parepa and her husband value his services that they offered him an engagement in England. After the death of Parepa, he, under the name of Campobello, appeared at Drury Lane in Mr Mapleson's Italian Opera performances. There he made the acquaintance of Madame Sinico, an estimable lady and an excellent artist, to whom he was shortly afterwards married. She will have in her great loss the deep sympathy of her husband's many friends and admirers. Mr Campbell returned to this country early in the present season to join Miss Kellogg's company, but he was almost immediately attacked with the illness which has just fatally terminated."

It need scarcely be added that Mr Henry Campbell (Signor Campobello) is happily alive and well.

MILAN.—The Teatro Carcano, repaired, repainted, and redecorated, was reopened on the 19th December with La Forza del Destino, the artists being Signore Berini, Maini, Pregiosi, Signori Frapolli, and D'Antoni. The house was crowded, and everything went off very well.

BRUSSELS.—In MM. Petit and Richard—the former a bass and the latter a light tenor—M. Campocasso has at length found two artists to the taste of his subscribers and the public generally. According to report, the managerial chair resigned by M. Campocasso is destined to be soon occupied by two gentlemen instead of one, the two gentlemen in question having been selected as the future joint managers of the Théâtre de la Monnaie by two or three capitalists who have subscribed the amount requisite, and formally applied to the Municipality for the "concession," as it is here styled.—The Italian Opera Company, under the management of Sig. Smecchia, will open at the Théâtre de l'Alhambra, on the 16th January next, for ten performances only, the engagements already entered into by Sig. Smecchia not allowing him to stay longer. There are two conductors, Signori Arditi and Aguirre. Among the principal artists, figure as sopranii and mezzo-soprani, Signore Artôt, Christino, Graziosi; as tenors, Signori Brignoli, Paoletti; as baritones, Signori Padilla, Graziosi; as bass, Sig. Borella; as buffos, Signori Caraccioli and Baldelli.—M. Henri Wieniawski has been appointed concert-master, professor of the violin, and professor of the quartet, at the Royal Conservatory of Music.

HAMLET.

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

SIR,—The Hamlet of Mr Irving, at the Lyceum, is a remarkable performance, and worthy the most attentive consideration of all Shakespearian students. The writer's opinion is that it is the best representation of the character since Mr Macready revelled in it—when that actor was in the plenitude of his great powers. Mr Irving's conception, and execution of his conception, of that generally-thought most difficult of Shakespeare's creations, are alike estimable. The melancholy cast of his countenance, his expressive features, his youthful figure, his graceful attitudes, are all so much in his favour. His gait, however, is rather inelegant, and unprincely. Allusion is made to this, as in estimating a performance in every way so superior to anything that may be seen besides, it is essential to point to everything that strikes the attentive observer. His crouching attitude on first seeing the Ghost is scarcely natural, though in addressing it, when he comes to the word "Father!" he rests on one knee, thus assuming a position graceful and reverential. During the remainder of this scene, nothing but praise must be awarded to the actor. His demeanour when struggling to free himself from Horatio's grasp, and his well-accentuated utterances, are all that can be desired. In the following scene—first, during the narration of the murder by the Ghost, and afterwards with his friends—he is admirable. The most loving of sons could not expect to find more filial respect and affection than he here evinces. From this time the character of Hamlet becomes a riddle. Naturally affectionate, intellectual, delicate, and timid, he is unable to carry out the desire of revenge. He becomes vacillating and untrusting. Hence his usual spontaneity is invariably checked. Mr Irving's manner to his friends when they come to him, after the Ghost has made the disclosure to Hamlet, well pourtrays this change. Some of the soliloquies, in the delivery of which tradition is altogether set at defiance, demand a little criticism. When the mind of a man is engaged in an internal conflict, and his breast is full of varied and sometimes opposite emotions, so that it is almost impossible to determine a course of action, then that man—if he be a really intellectual being, such as Hamlet is—begins to soliloquise. A mental turmoil precedes an utterance to oneself. Accordingly, a well-delivered soliloquy should augur to the listener all that has taken place beforehand, which occasions the "thinking aloud." In this respect Macready had no rival, and hence it is that Mr Irving is not altogether satisfactory. The mental restlessness, whether in sitting, leaning, standing, or walking, is not apparent, and the unconnected utterances are not always sufficiently well marked. The scene with Ophelia was thoughtful, and showed not only a perfect conception of the poet's intention, but a studied skill in holding back the expression of the affection which he had for her, in order that she might be deluded into the belief that his mind was not right. His chief scene with Polonius was sufficient to justify the old courtier in thinking the Prince's sanity was gone. His rapid reply of "Words, words," when asked what he was reading, was, however, scarcely natural, under the circumstances of his assumption of madness. The whole scene with the "minions," who admitted that they were sent to him by the King, could not beget an objection. His just resentment found its becoming climax when he broke the pipe in twain. When he first addresses the Players, he is natural, and quite worthy of a prince in his manner; but in his advice he is hardly sufficiently thoughtful. His speech seems too set; for if there is one thing more than another that should be given with meditative care, it is counsel, and the more necessary is it in the present case, as the issue is momentous—the guilt or innocence of the King is to be decided in Hamlet's mind by this play. I did not like Mr Irving's delivery of the line, "The play's the thing," &c.; nor know I a reason why a reference to his tablets should be made at this scene, which certainly fails to make an effective termination to the Act.

There can be no doubt that Hamlet's indecision in taking vengeance against his uncle arises from the natural gentleness of the Prince's character. It does not seem to accord with this view, that there should be too much demonstration on the part of Hamlet during the Play scene. The King is not aware that Hamlet knows of the murder; nor should Hamlet, by anticipation, suggest a knowledge of how the late king had died. The King should be influenced solely by the play, and not by any previous manner on Hamlet's part; else we are at a loss to know why Hamlet does not at once accuse the King of his fratricide, and avenge his father's murder. In this respect Mr Irving's acting is seemingly faulty, either in conception or execution. Yet this scene draws the largest amount of applause in the tragedy. Mr Irving may be correct, and the present writer's opinion may be wrong. I have ventured to say why I think Hamlet's manner here should not be quite so demonstrative.

The supreme contempt and abhorrence we must feel for the character of the King makes us almost regret that Hamlet does not kill him when kneeling at the altar, as was the Prince's first intention. The manner, action, tone, and accent of Mr Irving in the delivery of the speech in which he postpones his revenge till a time when it may be more complete, were all alike commendable; and in the scene following—in the chamber with his mother—he was at his best. To this I refer as the most thoroughly satisfactory of all. Nothing beyond the firmness and the affection displayed here by Mr Irving could be desired. Here was a semblance of perfection. Mr Irving thoroughly justified his reading, without reference to pictures or medallions. At the grave of Ophelia there is not scope for anything very great; it is the scene for the Grave-digger first, and afterwards for Laertes. And in not obtruding beyond the just circumstances of the occasion, Mr Irving merits much commendation. He might have sinned against his own counsel to the Players. That he did not do so counts much in his favour. The very ruffian-like way in which Laertes takes him by the throat would almost have secured him pardon if he had been less princely and more demonstrative.

Come we now to the close of the play, where the trial of skill is to take place, and the villany of the King and the treachery of Laertes are to receive their just punishment. Here Mr Irving was quite equal to himself. He was natural, easy, graceful, and prince-like. His opponent, on the contrary, was too like a fencing-master in his movements, and his attitudes rather too studied for the gentleman that he was. Mr Irving's manner of proceeding on being told by Laertes that a poisoned foil had struck him, and that it was the King who had planned it, proved that in his conception the character, after passing through the school of mental affliction, had found stability, and ridded itself of that indecision and vacillation which had been its defects. After so splendid a performance, the death was by too many taken for granted. But, watching it closely, I found that even this had been a study. It was quite different from the death of Matthias, in The Bells, yet quite as real. The causes being different, it was right that the carrying out of the effects in the two cases should not be alike. So it was. Concluding with what was predicted at the outset, I affirm this performance of Hamlet as remarkable as it is fine. Every student of Shakespeare, and every man with a mind beyond burlesque, should witness it.—I am, Sir, yours obediently,

16*th December*. F. E. PENNA.

POTSDAM.—A performance of Handel's Messiah was lately given in the Court and Garrison Church, by the Vocal Association for Classical Music, for the benefit of the Orphan Asylum. The sacred edifice was crowded. The vocalists were Mad. Anna Gerhardt, Herren Geyer and Prehn. The conductor was Herr Wendel.

COPENHAGEN.—As a rule, there is generally a dearth of music in this capital about Christmas. The present year, however, seems to be an exception. A large number of concerts were announced for the latter part of December. Among them may be mentioned the first Soirée for Chamber Music, given by the Royal Orchestra, on the 16th, and the second Subscription Concert of the Musical Association, on the 17th of the same month. At the former, one attraction offered was Hummel's Septet, which had not been heard for a considerable period. On the 21st the Choral Union gave a concert, at which "Marienlieder," by Johannes Brahms, and "L'Allegro ed Il Pensieroso," by Handel, occupied a prominent part in the programme.—The last thing in the way of quasi-novelty at the new Theatre Royal has been Hans Heiling, always a favourite opera here. In 1835, Marschner himself conducted a few early performances in this capital, and there was some talk of engaging him permanently as conductor. But the terms he demanded —5,000 Danish thalers yearly—were considered too high, and the negotiations consequently came to nothing.

BERLIN.—Mad. Agnes Eiswald recently gave a concert which deserves to be mentioned, because the programme included some hitherto unpublished Quartets for Female Voices, by Robert Schumann. These quartets were much relished, and will probably soon become generally known and admired.—A second performance of Handel's Hercules was given by the pupils and professors of the High School of Music, under the direction of Herr Joachim, with even greater success than the first. The room was crowded.—After being performed at Rome, Vienna, Pesth, Munich, Leipsic, and many other places, the Abbate Franz Liszt's oratorio of Die heilige Elisabeth has just been introduced, under the direction of Herr Oscar Eichberg, to the public of this capital. The vocalists were Mesdlles Breidenstein, Greube, Herren Schmock, and Prehn. The choruses were sung by the members of the Eichberg Vocal Association.—A lottery was got up, a short time since, under the auspices of the Baroness von Schleinitz, in aid of the National-Festival-Stage-Play Performances to be given at Baireuth. A large number of objects of art, pictures, drawings, curiosities, and so on, had been sent from all parts of Germany. The affair was very successful, and the sales effected realized some 7,000 thalers. The Empress gave 800 thalers for a drawing of the Wartburg, and the Countess of Hatzfeld 1,000 thalers for a portrait of the Composer of the Future himself.

MADAME GODDARD AT MELBOURNE.

(From the Illustrated "Australian News.")

The appearance of Madame Goddard in connection with the Melbourne Philharmonic Society, in the Town Hall, will be treasured among the most delightful musical reminiscences of the great pianist's visits to Victoria. The concert was given in aid of the Hospital Sunday Fund, and Madame Goddard manifested her practical sympathy with the charitable movement by declining an engagement at Ballarat, for which a guarantee of £100 was given her, in order that she might keep her engagement to aid the Metropolitan charities. Numbers were kept away from the concert by the wet weather, but, beyond the comparatively few who enjoyed the musical excellences of the performance, there are thousands who will appreciate the generous impulse that prompted Madame Goddard to give her services. Viewed from a musical point of view, the performance deserves high commendation. It was the means of bringing together the premier musical society of Australasia and an artist whose fame is world wide. Thanks to this combination of abilities, the public were enabled to enjoy, to great perfection, Weber's famous Concertstück, a work that has been under rehearsal on previous occasions by our musical societies, and has but once before been rendered in public. The success achieved was so pronounced that there was a unanimous desire for its repetition. It is almost superfluous to say that Madame Goddard played that portion of the work falling to her share with wonderful fidelity in the most difficult passages, and with rare delicacy throughout. The instrumentalists entered eagerly into their work; they seemed to appreciate the honour that was theirs in assisting in the production of so great a work for so good a cause, and the privilege of being associated with one so eminently qualified to interpret classical works as Madame Arabella Goddard. There was soul in the performance throughout; and if there were imperfections apparent to the critical, arising from study that was too brief for so grand a work, it was universally conceded that every orchestral unit did his best. The audience were led captive; and at the close there was a chorus of approval that had a genuine hearty ring about it, not often heard when music of the highest class is performed before a mixed audience. The other notable item in the programme was Beethoven's Choral Fantasia, by Madame Goddard and the vocal and instrumental forces of the Philharmonic Society. The performance was altogether of exceptional merit; every note from the piano was drunk in with rapture by the audience, and the interweaving of harmonies was so charmingly brought about by all concerned, that listeners could not but express their delight. Madame Goddard was recalled to receive a burst of applause, in which the members of the society joined. The lady bowed her thanks to the audience and the chorus, and expressed her satisfaction at the manner in which her efforts had been seconded. The selection of this Choral Fantasia for the Hospital Concert was peculiarly appropriate, for it was dedicated by Beethoven to the poor. In a letter to Varenna, in 1812, Beethoven said, "From my childhood, whenever my art could be serviceable to poor suffering humanity, I have never allowed any other motive to influence me, and never required anything beyond the heartfelt gratification that it always excited in me." Further on in the same letter, he says of the Fantasia that "it is given as a mark of sympathy with the destitute, to be considered as their property, and to be performed at any concerts intended for their sole benefit." This probably accidental carrying out of Beethoven's intentions made the selection most appropriate. Madame Goddard's Welsh Fantasia on national airs was another of those delightful performances that bring down raptures of applause. An encore followed, as a matter of course, and Thalberg's "Home, sweet home" was given in response. The entertainment was under the patronage of His Excellency the Governor. The concert was organized under the direction of Mr R. S. Smythe, whose managerial tact as a concert director has contributed not a little to the brilliant pecuniary success of Madame Goddard's two Australian tours.

MAGDEBURG.—Thanks to the unwearied exertions of Herren Rebling, Finzenhagen, Palme, Wehe, Brandt, and Wachsmuth, the inhabitants of this old town have had the opportunity of hearing a great deal of admirable music, during the past year. Among the more important works performed may be mentioned Requiem, Mozart; Requiem, Brahms; Alexander's Feast, Handel; and The Seasons, Haydn. Feska, Rolle, Ehrlich, Bruch, Ritter, Lachner, and Blumner, are some of the composers who have furnished works of smaller pretensions. Bach's Matthäus-Passion will shortly be performed by the Rebling Association.

DR VON BÜLOW'S RECITALS.

(From the "Times," December 25.)

Dr Hans von Bülow gave his last "recital" for the season on Wednesday afternoon in St James's Hall. The weather being unpropitious, the hall was not so crowded as is usually the case at these remarkable performances; nevertheless, those who came went away delighted with what they had heard. The learned Doctor is a thorough master of all schools, and seems to have the entire pianoforte repertory—from Bach and Handel down to Chopin, Mendelssohn, and Sterndale Bennett—not merely at his fingers' ends, but in his head. We may, now and then, differ from his manner of interpreting certain works; but such an artist has a perfect right to express himself after his own manner, and no one can question his extraordinary capacity. Dr von Bülow's selection of solo pieces on Wednesday comprised excerpts from Haydn, Mozart, Schubert, Joachim Raff, Chopin, and Liszt—all played, according to his invariable custom, without book. Such a memory as he possesses is little short of prodigious; not less so the facility with which he accomplishes every task set before him. We may fairly object to his somewhat over-coloured reading of Haydn's charming Variations, and to the extreme rapidity with which the well-known Gigue of Mozart, in G major, was given—a rapidity unknown in Mozart's time; but the Minuetto of Mozart, the Impromptu of Schubert (the third of the set, Op. 90), and Chopin's Notturno (No. 3, Op. 9), brought into prominence an exquisite delicacy of touch, a well balanced phrasing, and other qualities indispensable to the effect of such music, which left absolutely nothing to desire. We have always found the most complete satisfaction with Dr von Bülow when he reins in his Pegasus and cares nothing for "bravura"—or, in other language, for excessive mechanical display. The charm of his "pianissimo," as also of his "leggiero," is indescribable; and these had several opportunities of being felt and appreciated on Wednesday—as, for example, in a Serenade by Saint-Saëns and a Notturno by Raff, neither composition singularly impressive on its own account, but both made impressive through the genius of the executant. How exceptional are the manipulative powers of this "virtuoso" our musical readers need hardly be reminded. They were exhibited to supreme advantage in a fugue by Raff, the leading characteristic of which is its mechanical difficulty, and above all in a "concert study" by Liszt, entitled Waldersauschen, played in magnificent style, and (no wonder) unanimously asked for again. This time the pianist granted the earnest request of his audience, which he had declined to do after the Impromptu of Schubert—a less trying but far more beautiful piece. These, in addition to a scherzo by Chopin, a valse and Mazurka by Liszt, a sonata by J. S. Bach, and a trio by Beethoven, sum up the catalogue of Dr von Bülow's performances, which, sustained throughout with untiring vigour, kept attention alive to the end. In the sonata, the first of a series composed by Bach for pianoforte and violin, the great pianist enjoyed the co-operation of M. Sainton, to whom the instrumental music of the "Leipsic Cantor" is as familiar as that of any other master who has enriched the catalogue of "chamber music." To criticize the performance of the two would be superfluous, inasmuch as there was really nothing to find fault with. In the Serenade and Scherzo by Saint-Saëns (from the Suite, Op. 16), and the Notturno Caprice of Raff, both written for pianoforte and violoncello, Dr von Bülow found a thoroughly able associate in M. Lasserre, chief violoncello at Her Majesty's Opera. In the trio of Beethoven—last piece in the recital—his companions were the able professors we have named. The programme was agreeably varied by Miss Julia Wigan, the clever pupil of Mdme Sainton Dolby, who, besides an air from Halévy's opera, La Juive, and Mendelssohn's charming "Spring song" (welcome even in winter), introduced an Italian sonnetto, "Tanto gentile," the composition of Dr von Bülow himself, who ought to give us further specimens of his talent in this direction. The accompanist was Mr Walter Bache, one of Abbé Liszt's most staunch and enthusiastic disciples. The whole recital was a genuine treat to the admirers of modern "virtuosity," thus emphatically represented.

VENICE.—The Teatro della Fenice will open with Il Guarany, by Sig. Gomez. This will be followed by Meyerbeer's two operas, Dinorah and L'Etoile du Nord, and Donizetti's Lucia di Lammermoor. The artists engaged include Signore Peralta, Reschi, Cottino, Niccolini; Signori Tamagno, Baragli, Stile, Balletti, Nollet, Carbone, and Capponi. Sig. Kuon will be the conductor for opera, and Sig. G. Scaramelli, for dance-music. The ballet selected is Taglioni's Satanella, the principal parts being sustained by Signora Ratti and Sig. Mendez.

MUSIC IN GLASGOW.

Macfarren's St John the Baptist was performed for the first time in Glasgow on Monday last; the executants being the Choral Union; the conductor, Mr Lambeth. The intelligent and truth-speaking critic of the Herald thus refers to this interesting event:—

"Last night the ninth concert of the present series, under the auspices of the Glasgow Choral Union, was given in the City Hall to an audience which comfortably filled the gloomy room. It may be assumed that those who were present at last evening's concert have given some attention to the able explanatory notes and musical illustrations in the programme, written by Mr Joseph Bennett, of London, and, therefore, know as much about the work as we can tell them. But our readers generally may be interested in a brief sketch of an oratorio which has so rapidly gained high favour. On its production at the Bristol Festival of last year, St John the Baptist, Mr Macfarren's only oratorio, was accepted at its very first performance as a masterpiece. No work since the production of Mendelssohn's Elijah has caused such a genuine sensation. All classes of musicians were astonished to find that a composer previously known only as a writer of operas, songs, and orchestral music, should have been able at one bound to place himself on a level with the giants of sacred song writing. In Glasgow Mr Macfarren is probably best known as the composer of the incomparable symphonies and accompaniments to an edition of Scottish songs. The oratorio was composed expressly for the Gloucester Festival of 1871, but, owing to some differences, was rejected. The Gloucester committee did not know the gem they so ruthlessly cast away for an idea. The management of the Bristol Musical Festival acted differently, and theirs is the honour of giving birth to a rare production of genius. The directors of the Choral Union deserve the best thanks of the musical public of Glasgow for having so promptly produced this great work."

The writer then goes on to describe the oratorio; continuing thus with regard to its rendering:—

"Little need be said regarding last night's performance. Madame Sinico, who took the part of Salome, pleased the audience in an unusual degree. Her bright singing of 'I rejoice in my youth' was so generally and so continuously applauded that she kindly repeated it. Miss Alice Fairman's fine contralto voice told effectively in the many recitatives allotted to the part of the Narrator; and the execution of her only solo, 'In the beginning was the Word,' was received with warm demonstrations of approval. Mr Nelson Varley, who is at all times anxious to give a good account of what he undertakes, was singularly successful last night, and everything he sang merited and received cordial acknowledgment. On Mr Santley fell the chief burden of the solo work, and in its performance he acquitted himself as no other living vocalist could. The Choral Union itself was not at its very best, but great allowance must be made for the pernicious efforts of such inclement weather as is now being experienced; and the fact must be taken into account that the work was entirely new to the choristers. By another time, however, the combined forces should reconsider their idea of the 'Supper Scene,' as last night the music was given without due consideration of its delicate effects. As rendered last night, it sounded harsh and obtrusive; whereas, when well rendered, the effect is grace itself. The 'resident orchestra' proved to be less satisfying than had been anticipated. This result, we imagine, can only be accounted for by insufficient rehearsals. The opening of the superb overture was distinctly unsatisfactory."

Charing Cross Theatre.—The above, though, perhaps, the last, or one of the last, with regard to size, is certainly not the least, or anything near the least, of London theatres, in respect to the attractiveness of the entertainment it offers the public. The clever extravaganza of Aladdin, by Mr Frank Green, revised by Mr Harry Robinson, still "goes" as well as ever, and, moreover, "vires acquirit eundo." The fair manageress, Miss Carry Nelson, as Aladdin, appears to great advantage, and fully sustains her previous reputation. Nor is this all. She is admirably supported by the leading members of her company. Among these we may especially mention Miss Beresford, who, as the Princess, turns to good account the opportunity presented her of proving that she possesses a charming voice and knows how to use it effectively. This young lady, new to the metropolitan boards, is a decided acquisition. It is to be hoped that she will not, like so many others, be spoilt by the applause and encores she receives, but continue to work steadily at the further development of the natural gifts which have already secured her a gratifying success. Nor must Miss Edith Lynd, the representative of Tealeaf, be passed over in silence. She acquits herself very well. Mr F. W. Irish, as the Widow Mustapha, exhibits comic talent of no mean order. The "topical" song of "Poor Mrs Somebody," as sung by him, is encored no end of times every night, and is an undoubtedly big hit. It is really a pity that the stay of Miss Carry Nelson and her company in King William Street is limited—as announced before they opened—to twelve nights.

MUSIC IN MANCHESTER.

(From our Correspondent.)

Since my last letter, we have had no fewer than four performances of the Messiah in the Free Trade Hall—two under Mr Hallé's direction, with Mdme Lemmens-Sherrington, Mdme Patey, Miss Enriquez, Mr Perren, Mr Nelson Varley, and Mr Santley as the principal singers; and two under Mr De Jong's direction, with Mdme Edna Hall, Miss Julia Elton, Mr Pearson, and Mr Wadmore.

At Mr Hallé's last concert, Madame Norman-Néruda played Viotti's Concerto and Vieuxtemps' "Air Varié," to the great delight of the audience. Miss Sterling's singing also created a very favourable impression. Brahm's Hungarian Dances, for the orchestra, was the instrumental novelty, and was heard with great interest; and how the familiar Italian Symphony was received by the most musical audience in this musical city, I hope I need not say. On Thursday night, Israel in Egypt will be given at Mr Hallé's concert; but, I am sorry to say, without Mr Sims Reeves, who had been announced to sing.

On Saturday last, Haydn's Festival Symphony was given at Mr De Jong's concert, with all the original effects, &c. This week there will be several concerts of military music in the Free Trade Hall.

Miss Amina Goodwin, the juvenile pianist, played with success at the Gentlemen's Concert on Monday, at which, also, Signor and Madame Giulio Perkins sang.

MUSIC IN NEW ZEALAND.

(From our Correspondent.)

After some three months absence the Allen Opera Company has returned, and are playing to enormous houses. The admirable manner in which the operas are put on the stage, and the general excellence of the company have, of course, produced an effect, but the great secret of success is doubtless in Miss Alice May's impersonation of so many and varied characters. The press, without an exception, pronounce her the greatest prima donna ever heard in these colonies; and several "old stagers," as they style themselves, and not long from home, maintain there is no one in Europe who could compete with her in a round of characters. Her voice seems to improve with time, and the praise she has received has only increased her desire to attain higher excellence. She made her first appearance as Marguerite in Napier, last week, and the papers describe it as far surpassing anything they had seen on the lyrical stage; and, it must be noted, that many of these writers are experienced critics, not long from home. My own conviction is, that a New Zealand audience is as well able to judge an opera and a singer as any audience I ever met with, and some of the members of the company who would be considered very good in most places are sometimes rather roughly handled here. The enthusiastic reception Miss May always receives on her appearance must convince her how thoroughly she has won the admiration of her auditors, and help to confirm her in the opinion that she may venture to appear in America and Europe, whither she intends bending her steps on the conclusion of her present tour. The company remains here for nearly a month, and then proceeds to Wanganui and Christchurch.

Wellington, September 22nd, 1874.

Genoa.—The season at the Carlo Felice was to be inaugurated on the 26th December by La Forza del Destino, and the ballet of Il Selam maraviglioso. The second opera was to be Salvator Rosa, by Sig. Gomez.

Dortmund.—It may be remembered that, when the news of the attempted assassination of Prince von Bismarck by Kullmann reached this place, a few patriotic individuals offered a prize of 1,000 thalers for the best musical composition in commemoration of the Imperial Chancellor's escape. The period within which candidates were to forward their works has now expired. One hundred and fifty composers have entered the lists, and the average merit of their efforts is so good that the judges will have some difficulty, it is said, in making their award. The hundred and fifty compositions sent in comprise twenty-five Songs with Pianoforte Accompaniment, one Sonata for Pianoforte, four long compositions without words, eight Marches, and a host of pieces for Orchestra, Soloists, and Chorus.

The Musical World,

LONDON, SATURDAY, JANUARY 2, 1875.

THE daily concerts at the Royal Albert Hall have now ceased and determined, to the surprise, perhaps, of few, to the regret, let us hope, of many. Those who know by observation how long it takes to establish an enterprise of the kind, will marvel that the directors were not prepared to work on during a much more extended period than seven weeks. "Not being so prepared," such persons will say, "the scheme ought never to have been entertained." There is a good deal of cogency in the argument, because if anything be more true than any other thing in the musical world, it is that success for a good enterprise can only follow upon long-sustained loss. The Albert Hall managers should have been equipped for at least a year's campaign; by the end of which some trustworthy indications as to ultimate results would probably have become obvious. A struggle of seven weeks' duration was a foregone defeat, even under the most advantageous conditions; much more when continued bad weather practically isolated the Albert Hall, by making access to it a matter of difficulty, such as should be encountered only in special cases. But crying over spilt milk is an unprofitable occupation; and, it may be, there are reasons, in this particular instance, why it should be regarded as unnecessary. We have nothing but praise for all who were connected with the working of the daily concerts. From Mr Alfred Littleton, a manager of infinite tact, courtesy, and business habits, down to the least important member of his staff, the necessary labour was done with an energy and devotion that left nothing to desire. But the resources at command, large though they were, and the skill which directed them, great though it was, could not endure the strain of six concerts a week. Much was accomplished certainly—more than ever before—yet not all; and the fact could scarcely have been hidden even from those who looked with a desire to see nothing but good.

In the current number of the Musical Times appears an authoritative exposition of the plans which the managers of the late daily concerts now entertain. We rejoice to find that, while their too sanguine hopes have not been realized, they still keep the field, and are prepared to go on under modified conditions. In this we have an example of the national virtue which refuses to accept defeat. According to the logic of warfare, the Duke was beaten at Waterloo, but he declined to see the fact, and held on till Fortune's scale kicked the beam in his favour. So, logically, the directors of the Albert Hall Concerts have been discomfited by circumstances; nevertheless they mean to effect a change of front, and continue the strife. This time we see a lot of circumstances on their side. It is good for them that no more than two concerts per week will be given. Ample time will thus be available for preparation, and no work need be essayed without an absolute certainty of success. Of the two concerts thus determined upon, one will appeal to popular tastes, while keeping in view the fact that a miscellaneous audience is not wholly incompatible with a proportion, we will not say of good music, because there is good music of all sorts, but of music having high claims. The second concert will be alternately devoted to oratorio and orchestral works; thus making the scheme cover all the ground occupied by the daily performances. In commending the new arrangement, we are specially glad to observe that the directors have made up their minds to work it on the very liberal scale demanded by the edifice in which the concerts are to take place. The vast area of the Albert Hall insists upon large executive resources as an absolute essential; and when the orchestra directed by Mr Barnby numbers over 100 instruments, and when his chorus musters some 1,200 strong, we may look for those results which alone can satisfy the exigencies of the place. It is, we believe, the intention of the directors to make the necessary augmentation of force ere the concerts begin again; and we anticipate the happiest consequences to flow therefrom. In all other respects, the concerts will go on as heretofore, presenting the best available talent (the appearance of Herr Wilhelmj is announced, for example), and managed under the influence of an ardent desire to attain the best musical results independent of those personal, and therefore, narrow considerations which too often have the upper hand.

The new series of concerts will begin on January 19, when, we hope, a key-note of success will be struck in the most effectual manner. Messrs Novello, Ewer & Co. have deserved such a reward for their labour and enterprise, and we are sure that none will grudge it to them.

THERE is no truth in the report that Mr Mapleson is going to the new theatre in the Haymarket with his Italian operatic company. For the present he remains at Drury Lane Theatre.

OCCASIONAL NOTES.

Mdlle Marie Krebs has been playing the music of our countryman, Sir Sterndale Bennett, in various towns of Germany with marked success. The last of his Three Impromptus (in F sharp minor) has especially created a sensation, and all the German pianists are anxious to play it. How few of them could play it like Marie Krebs may well be imagined. Of course, the only pianist who ever attempted it in England was Arabella Goddard, who is banished from England, because, for an Englishwoman, she played too well.

Sir Julius Benedict has composed a fantasia upon "The Star Spangled Banner," for Mdme Arabella Goddard, who will, no doubt, play it in California, and elsewhere in the United States. Sir Julius has always shown himself a staunch and devoted friend to the greatest of our English pianists; and his friendship does not stint because she is now so many thousand miles away. That is true friendship, but nothing surprising from the gifted author of St Peter. Sir Julius can hardly have forgotten A. G.'s magnificent performance of his magnificent Concerto in E flat at the Birmingham Festival and the Crystal Palace.

Mr Boucicault's name is so constantly before the public as the author of the most successful dramas of the time, that pains have been taken to ascertain as accurately as possible the number of plays he has written, and the number of times each has been performed. Mr Boucicault has written over four hundred plays. The names of the most successful are as follows, and to each is appended the number of times it has been performed:—The Colleen Bawn, 3,100 times; Arrah-na-Pogue, 2,400; London Assurance, 2,900; Rip Van Winkle, 1,400; Old Heads and Young Hearts, 1,259; The Octoroon, 1,800; Formosa, 1,100; Jessie Brown, 820; The Corsican Brothers, 2,200; Don Cæsar de Bazan, 1,700; Used Up, 1,350; The Willow Copse, 1,110; The Streets of New York, 2,860; and Led Astray, 498. These are the leading ones. Others have had a run of from 100 to 1000 nights each. The total number of all the performances must have been nearly 50,000. Assuming that the receipts to each performance averaged 500 dols., the money paid by the public to witness these works would amount to 25,000,000 dols. The profits of London Assurance, when first produced at Covent Garden Theatre, as appears from the record of the management, were 120,000 dols.; the profits of The Colleen Bawn were 200,000 dols. in one year; the profits of Arrah-na-Pogue, 180,000 dols. The gross receipts of Led Astray, last year, at the Union Square Theatre, amounted to 154,000 dols., of which 80,000 dols. were profit. On these four pieces the theatres cleared upwards of 600,000 dols.—Arcadian.

Magnanini, 15th August, Teatro Sociale, Carpi; ‡ I Pezzenti, Sig. Canepa, 21st Sept., the Scala, Milan; ‡ Raffaello e la Fornarina, semi-serious, Sig. Chisotti, 30th Sept., Teatro Alfieri, Turin; * Il Duca di Tapigliano, comic, Sig. Cagnoni, 10th Oct., Teatro Sociale, Lecco; † La Contessa di S. Romano, Sig. Frangini, 10th Oct., Teatro Alfieri, Florence; † Piccarda Donati, Sig. Burali-Forti, 31st Oct., Teatro Petrarca, Arezzo; † O Mégo per Forza, comic and in the Genoese dialect, Sig. Novaro, 31st Oct., Teatro Nazionale, Genoa; † Velleda, Sig. Cajani, November, Teatro Nazionale, Fojano; † Lorenzino de' Medici, Sig. Marenco, 1st December, Teatro Nazionale, Lodi; † L'Ultimo dei Mori in Ispagna, Sig. Paravano, 12th Dec., Teatro Mercadante, Naples. Of the above 35 operas—against 24 in 1873, but 56 in 1872—5, marked with an asterisk (*), were very successful; 23 marked with a dagger (†), successful; 6, marked with a double-dagger (‡), moderately successful; and 1, which the reader is left to find for himself, a failure.

CONCERT.

Mrs George Linley's first grand evening concert took place on Tuesday, the 22nd inst., at the Onslow Hall, South Kensington, and was attended by a large and fashionable audience. The programme opened with Rivière's well-known chorus, "Spring, gentle spring," which was sung by the juvenile members of the choir of St Peter's, Onslow Gardens, who, in the second part, created great enthusiasm by their hearty rendering of some Christmas carols, under the efficient direction of Mr Willis. Mr Albert James was most successful in Blumenthal's famous song, "The Message," and in "The Thorn." The latter being encored, Mr James substituted "Phillis is my only joy," which also gave general satisfaction. The well-known song, "Kathleen Mavourneen," was excellently rendered by the concert-giver, who afterwards sang the old ballad, "Within a mile o' Edinbro' town," with such point and vigour, that it was re-demanded. Mrs Linley, however, gave, instead, Schubert's "Addio," and thereby shewed that she was a mistress of different languages as well as of different styles of music. Miss Sophie Ferrari sang, with charming taste and thorough feeling, Spohr's "The bird and the maiden," to which Mr Lazarus played the obbligato clarionet part in his own finished and musicianly manner. Miss Ferrari afterwards gave Mr J. P. Knight's "She wore a wreath of roses," with a pathos and simplicity that captivated the audience. She was unanimously encored in both songs, and substituted for the latter "Home, sweet home." Miss Francesca Ferrari contributed, in her own "winning way," Mr Molloy's "Don't be sorrowful, darling" (encored), and also joined her sister in the duet, "I know a bank." Masters George and John Linley were rapturously encored in the duet, "I would that my love," a compliment they well deserved. The instrumental portion was ably supplied by the Rev. C. C. Scholefield, Mr Lazarus, and Herr Oberthür, whose genuine talent as a harpist and a composer for his instrument is well known. He introduced his own composition, "Clouds and Sunshine," and, being encored, he gave his admired piece, "La Cascade," which was equally successful. The Rev. C. C. Scholefield and Mr Lazarus delighted the audience by their performance of Webet's Grand Duo Concertante, for clarionet and piano, as well as by their respective solos. The concert concluded with the National Anthem.

The Benedict Testimonial.—The lamented death of Mr John Mitchell, who took so active a part in promoting the Benedict testimonial, has necessitated the postponement of the presentation. Though the precise period when this token of public esteem is to be offered to Sir Julius Benedict has not been definitely fixed, we believe there is good ground for stating that the occasion will now be deferred until the London season has fairly commenced, when many of the distinguished composer's warmest admirers, who are now scattered far and wide, and who would naturally be desirous of joining in the manifestation, shall again have been brought together.

We are happy to state that Mdlle Tietjens is recovering from her severe indisposition.

We hear, on good authority, that Offenbach has engaged to write an opéra bouffe for Mr George Wood (J. B. Cramer and Co.) on the subject of Don Quixote.

PROVINCIAL.

EDINBURGH.—Professor Oakeley—says the Edinburgh Courant—gave on Thursday, the 24th ult., in his class-room, an organ recital; and, being Christmas Eve, the room was very tastefully decorated with holly and evergreens sent from Mortonhall and Southbank, while the programme of music played was appropriate to the festive season of Christmas. The ornamentation of the hall was enhanced by the exhibition of a number of beautiful models of English and foreign cathedrals in which service is held on Christmas Eve; as also by a well-finished bust of Paganini, just presented to the Music Chair by Professor Hodgson. There was a large and fashionable audience, who frequently demonstrated their admiration of Dr Oakeley's brilliant playing.

MANCHESTER.—Last week the Shelley and Old Glossop hand-bell ringers contested at Belle Vue Gardens for the championship of England, and a prize of £50 offered by Messrs Jennison. Each of the bands has won three successive first prizes, thus excluding themselves for a similar number of years from the date of their last success from the annual competitions at Belle Vue. The Shelley band, which is the oldest of the two, numbers, including the conductor, eight ringers, while in the Old Glossop there are twelve, though the former ring quite as many bells as the latter. The Glossop ringers' selection comprised the Kyrie and Gloria (Mozart), Haydn's No. 1 Symphony, and a Rondo Brillante. Their opponents also played Haydn's First Symphony and Haydn's D Symphony, and the overture to Zanetta. The judges were: Mr C. Warwick Jordan, Mus. Bac., Lewisham, Kent; Mr L. Goodwin, organist, Church of the Holy Name, Manchester; and Mr W. J. Young, professor of music, Manchester; and these gentlemen decided, after a contest lasting two hours, that the prize should be awarded to the Shelley ringers, though they expressed their opinion that the arrangement and execution by the Old Glossop band of Haydn's First Symphony were superior to those of the other band. The result was hailed with considerable applause by the friends of the Shelley players.

SHEFFIELD.—Mr Charles Harvey's subscription concert took place, notwithstanding the disappointment at Mr Sims Reeves not making his appearance, owing to the severity of the weather, which prevented the great tenor from fulfilling his engagement. "We are, nevertheless, pleased that the concert was not postponed"—says the Independent of December 23—"the large and fashionable audience that assembled last night found a thoroughly refined and competent substitute in Mr W. H. Cummings. Mr Cummings has for many years taken his stand among the most useful and intelligent of English tenors, while, as a skilful—and, perhaps, we may add, a scholarly—musician, he is far in advance of nine-tenths of his brethren. It may not be known that he is the composer of a number of interesting musical fragments, exclusive of one or two works of considerable proportions. Mr Harvey had arranged that the change of singers should not interfere with the original construction of the programme, and Mr Cummings's special capacity for interpreting sacred music enabled him to do ample justice to the recitative and air, "Deeper and deeper still" and "Watt her, angels, to the skies." The recitative was declaimed by Mr Cummings with dramatic fervour and touching expressiveness; but he was even more successful in his rendering of the exquisite air, into which he infused a tone of hopeful pathos, which was impressive in the highest sense. The other songs given by the same gentleman were "Once Again," by Arthur Sullivan, and "Silly in our Alley." Madame Patey—immeasurably the best of English contraltos—experienced a reception nothing short of enthusiastic. She was in fine voice, and in all her efforts elicited a complete ovation. An encore was insisted upon in each instance. Mr J. G. Patey (mellow-voiced, and artistic of style) furnished several thoroughly welcome contributions, all of which were received with unfeigned satisfaction. Madame Thaddeus Wells gave three ballads successfully. Mr Zerbini accompanied the vocal music on the pianoforte.

WINDSOR.—A special service—a correspondent writes us—was held in St George's Chapel on Christmas Eve, by permission of the Very Rev. the Hon. Gerald Wellesley, Dean of Windsor. It having been announced that a selection from the Messiah would be given, a large audience assembled, and completely filled the vast edifice (including the aisle). By the judicious issue of tickets, overcrowding was avoided, and the excellent arrangements of the Rev. Canon Everett enabled all who presented themselves for admission to enjoy the service to their hearts' content. The choir was composed of the Gentlemen of St George's Chapel, the Gentlemen of Eton College Chapel, supplemented by 22 soprani, 12 alti, 15 tenori, and 14 bassi—altogether, an excellent choral body. The service was intoned by the Rev. Mr Everett, Minor Canon, the lessons being read by the Rev. St John Blunt, Hon. Canon of Windsor and Rector of Old Windsor. In the selection from the Messiah, the solos were entrusted to Masters Whitehouse and Smith, Messrs Hunt, Marriott, and H. Barnby. In the first solo, "Comfort ye," Mr Hunt gave an excellent rendering, he was painstaking, singing without effort, and in good taste, putting one in mind of Mr Lockey in his style of delivery. Of Mr Marriott's solo, "Behold, a virgin," it need only be said that he sang as a veteran, and as such left nothing to be desired. To criticize Mr Barnby's delivery of "For behold darkness" would be unfair, as, unfortunately, he was evidently suffering from hoarseness, which produced a consequent amount of nervousness we are unaccustomed to find associated with that gentleman. Masters Whitehouse and Smith left nothing to be desired in "He shall feed His flock" and "Come unto Him," the freshness of their voices and their excellent training never showed itself to greater advantage than in the solos entrusted to them in this instance. Of the selected choruses we can speak with unqualified praise, "For unto us," "Glory to God," and the "Hallelujah"—especially the "Hallelujah"—evidently creating a marked effect upon the audience. Sir George Elvey presided at the organ, and to him we are not only indebted for the successful conduct of a more than ordinarily acceptable service, but likewise for an accompaniment to Handel's masterpiece which we but occasionally meet with. H.R.H. Prince Christian and the Princess Christian attended the service.

REVIEWS.

LAMBORN COCK.

Songs for Children. No. 8. "The Dog and the Cow." Words by Mrs R. B. TRITTON. Music by Mrs WORTHINGTON BLISS.

THE words of this song are full of genuine humour, and children of the largest possible growth may find in them plenty of occasion for laughter. Here is the first verse as sample:—

"A dog came up to a cow one day,
And said, as he bowed quite low,
'I've hired a balloon to go up to the moon,
And I very much hope you'll go.'
The cow was dress'd in her Sunday best,
With a wreath on her radiant brow,
And she whispered 'Yes,' with a modest 'moo,'
While the dog said 'Bow-wow, bow-wow.'"

Mrs Bliss's music is admirably in keeping with the droll verses, and the whole makes up a capital ditty for children's gatherings.

Little Alice (from "Wonderland"). Written by F. E. WEATHERLY, M.A Composed by CLEVELAND WIGAN.

PRETTY verses, pretty music, and pretty title page—altogether a pretty thing. Let those who cater for young people in musical things look to it.

JOSEPH WILLIAMS.

Illustrations of National Music. Edited by BRINLEY RICHARDS. No. I. The Rakotzy March (Liszt). No. II. Grand Study on the Pentatonic Scale (Chopin).

MR RICHARDS will do good service by persevering with the series of which these two pieces are the beginning. The more general an acquaintance with all varieties of national music, the more are the resources of the art increased; for it is a fact that nearly every marked form of rhythm and scale in classical art owes its origin to the "people," among whom it grew, rather than was invented. The examples before us could not have been better chosen, and alike in the famous Hungarian March, and in Chopin's curious Study, much of an interesting nature will be discovered by those who have eyes to see.

La Española. Caprice Espagnole pour Piano, par FRANCESCO BERGER.

THE Spanish character in this composition is well preserved throughout, and gives it no ordinary piquancy. Amateurs will find the Caprice easy to play, and very effective as a morceau de salon. Key, G.

Fairy Land. For the Pianoforte, by FRANCESCO BERGER.

A LIGHT, pretty and easy piece, in the key of C, and one such as amateurs will welcome, because it secures the maximum of effect with the minimum of effort.

LONDON (Ontario).—The Hellmuth Ladies' School was re-opened on September 2nd under the most favourable auspices, and with a considerable increase in the number of boarding pupils. The College is evidently growing in public favour, and continues to be largely attended by pupils from every part, both of Canada and the United States. The Principal and Lady Principal, Rev. H. F. Darnell and Mrs Darnell, have been cordially received and supported by the College Staff, and Miss McClellan, the able Lady Superintendent, Miss Clinton and Miss Williams fill their former positions with their usual zeal and efficiency. The Teaching Staff has been further strengthened by the following additions:—French, Rev. Prof. Gilmont and Mdlle Fournier German, Fraulein Schenck; English, Miss Browne.—Huron Recorder.

Social Intercourse.

"The contact of society is necessary for the nurture and the preservation of the generous feelings implanted in us by the Great Spirit."

(From "Another World.")

In the system I inaugurated, where every man pursued his occupation with enthusiastic delight, because he was engaged in that for which nature and education had fitted him, it became necessary to enjoin recreation and amusement as a duty, particularly in the case of learned men, whose attention was concentrated on one particular subject.

Before my reign learned men had been sometimes prone to seclude themselves from the world, while the opulent indulged in amusements to excess, and had indeed need of laws rather to restrain than to enjoin indulgence. Now, however, few except the "humble" classes (for we have no "poor" in your sense of the world), would have sought after diversions had not my laws enjoined them as a duty.

As regards learned men, I knew that if one part of the brain was unduly excited and overworked, the other parts would lie dormant and suffer. All classes therefore were required to "undergo" amusements, and many were the precepts to encourage them in the pursuit. I added to these the force of my own example; for, though occupied incessantly with the cares of government and with abstruse meditations, I nevertheless attended amusements of all kinds, and often gave fêtes of great beauty and magnificence for the recreation of the people. I was a frequent attendant at places of amusement, public games, and races, and refreshed myself almost daily with the sympathetic contact of the numerous society which my hospitality brought round my table.

When my laws on the subject of social intercourse were first promulgated there were many wise men who questioned the wisdom of my requiring the learned to cultivate social relations. These addressed to me many arguments in support of their views, and objected that, without having their thoughts interrupted by the clang of society, simple changes of subject, or at least the simplest distractions, would amply suffice to give the necessary repose. I always encouraged the learned to communicate to me their opinions, to which I invariably listened with attention; and in this case the arguments they adduced in support of their views were so plausible that I resolved to convince them by an actual experiment.

To satisfy them, and confirm the belief of others, I allowed the chief opponents of my doctrines to select ten learned men who desired to pursue their own idea of seclusion, and ten others were selected by me from those who were converts to my views in matters of recreation and amusement. The twenty men thus selected were, as nearly as possible equal in point of talent, and were all engaged on the same engrossing subject—one which required great concentration of thought. The utmost care was taken that the experiment might be fairly and conclusively tried.

The result of this experiment, which extended over many years, proved indisputably that I was right; for, whilst the productions of the "amusing and amused" men were equal in all, and in many respects superior, to those of the "seclusionists," the latter showed visible marks of the evils of their abstinence.

After a few years their indifference for the world had grown into positive misanthropy. They refused to receive any visits, became negligent of their personal appearance, and centred their whole affection upon the object of their study.

PRESENTATION TO MR CURWEN.

A very large and enthusiastic meeting was held on Wednesday evening in the great room of Exeter Hall, respectably filling it, for the purpose of publicly presenting to the Rev. John Curwen and Mrs Curwen testimonials of affectionate admiration for their strenuous and successful exertions in popularising skilled vocal music by the establishment of the Tonic Sol-Fa Association. In the absence of Sir Charles Reed, who had been advertised to preside, but who was prevented by indisposition from fulfilling his engagement, the chair was filled by Mr Hugh Matheson, of Hampstead. After the singing of the hymn, "O worship the King," by way of overture, the honorary secretary, Mr Proudman, read an extract from Sir Charles Reed's letter, expressing his deep regret at being too unwell to keep his appointment. The secretary next read letters from Lord Shaftesbury, Sir John Goss, Mr Frederick Smith, Mr G. A. Macfarren, and the Revs J Walker and T. Ryder, conveying the expression of their entire sympathy with the objects of the subscribers and their admiration of the founder of the Tonic Sol-Fa Association.

The Sol-faists then sang with admirable verve and precision "The Comrades' Song of Hope," the words by J. S. Stallybrass, and the music by Adolphe Adam. The address of presentation was then read by the honorary secretary of the Testimonial Committee, Mr Proudman. It expressed the pleasure with which the teachers, pupils, and friends of the Tonic Sol-Fa method met Mr Curwen on that occasion. They offered him their hearty congratulations upon the remarkable success which had followed his efforts for the extension of popular musical education. They expressed their belief that it was to him they were mainly indebted for the restoration of scientific truth in the teaching of music, and that to him likewise they were indebted for its simplification by means of the Tonic Sol-Fa method of notation.

The subscribers wished also to encourage Mr Curwen for the future, and to assure him that, in his plans for the consolidation of the Tonic Sol-Fa College, he might expect not only their sympathy and good wishes, but also their hearty co-operation. As an earnest of this they asked him to accept the sum of money to be presented to him that night as a practical, though inadequate, expression of their friendship and personal regard.

Mr Linder, the earliest treasurer of the association, now, in the name of the subscribers, made the presentation of a cheque, the amount of which was not stated, to Mr Curwen, and to Mrs Curwen an expressive portrait of her husband, painted by Mr J. Edgar Williams. The artist was loudly called for and enthusiastically cheered. The part-song, "Who thro' heaven is guiding," conducted by Mr R. Griffiths, was next sung. Mr Curwen acknowledged the gratifying testimonials to himself and Mrs Curwen. He gave an interesting account of his first engagement in the improvement of popular vocal music, more than thirty years ago, of the severity of his early struggles, and of his ultimate triumphs. He reviewed at some length the past history and present prospects of the Sol-Fa movement for musical reform, and augured for it, in spite of momentary official discouragement, a bright future. The elementary schools were calling for the Sol-Fa method, and the school inspectors were all endorsing it. With this pressure behind, the Privy Council would, in due time, give way, and the system would force an entrance into the Normal Colleges. Mr Curwen gratefully enumerated the names of some of the more eminent of his coadjutors in the work. Among those who had passed away, the late General Perronet Thompson was conspicuous. Mr Curwen's address was greeted throughout with cheers. The old Scotch song, "Should auld acquaintance be forgot," most appropriately followed, with effective organ accompaniment by Mr Harris. The Sol-faing was ably conducted by Mr W. M. Miller, of Glasgow. It was executed with great spirit. In an admirable speech for Scotland, by Mr Colin Brown, of the Andersonian University, Glasgow, it was mentioned that in that city alone there are 50,000 Sol-faists. Mr Brinley Richards spoke most appropriately, as the representative of Welsh lovers of music, and other interesting addresses followed. After votes of thanks, the meeting concluded with the "Hallelujah Chorus," under the conduct of Mr Proudman.

ROYAL ALBERT HALL.

The concert given on the afternoon of Boxing-day was not, unfortunately, enriched with the presence of Mr Sims Reeves, who, at the eleventh hour, telegraphed his inability to attend, in consequence of the foggy weather. The public, of good holiday dimensions as regarded the cheaper parts of the building, did not put up very amiably with the announcement, and, during the greater part of the concert, vented their displeasure in angry apostrophes, and now and then obstructed, with considerable persistence, the course of the performance. In addition to the absence of Mr Sims Reeves, there was that also of Mr Edward Lloyd to further suggest irritation and disturb the common harmony. The concert, however, bating these disappointments, was by no means a weak one of its kind, and, being constructed upon strictly popular principles, was well calculated to please the shilling ear. Mdme Lemmens-Sherrington, in spite of the unfriendly demonstrations she met with, soon quelled the fractious remonstrants who chafed at the loss of their favourite tenor, and obtained a triumphant encore in Claribel's ballad "Come back to Erin," a recall in her husband's song "The Bird of Love," and universal acclamation in the Shadow Song from Dinorah, with which florid morceau, executed by her to perfection, the concert terminated. Then there was Miss Antoinette Sterling, whose quaint old ditty, "The three ravens," and Burns's famous song "A man's a man for a' that," are always points of interest. The latter, as usual, was redemanded, a compliment also bestowed upon the same vocalist in a new song by Mr Barnby, called "When the flowing tide comes in," the pathetic sentiment of which, akin in motive to the intensely touching words of Kingsley's "The three fishers," made itself generally felt among all who listened to it—gentle and simple alike. The composer was his own accompanist. Mr Whitney, who has seldom been absent from the Albert Hall Concerts, sang "Non più andrai," a new song by Arthur Sullivan—though scarcely up to the Sullivan mark—named "Christmas bells at sea," and Weiss's popular "Village Blacksmith." Mr Levy contributed, at intervals, solos on the cornet, and, it need hardly be observed, with his customary success; and Mr Hughes exhibited no inferiority of skill in his performance of "O ruddier than the cherry" on the ophicleide. The overtures to Fra Diavolo and Guillaume Tell were played with signal excellence by the orchestra; and the general conductors of the concert were Mr Barnby, Mr Randegger and Mr Pollitzer.

DEATH'S DOINGS IN 1874.

Literature and the drama have lost representatives, more or less important, in M. Guizot, Mr Shirley Brooks, Mr Bellew (the popular lecturer), Mr John Heneage Jesse, Miss Agnes Strickland, Mr James Hannay, Mr Tom Hood, M. Sylvain Van de Weyer, Mr Albert Way, F.S.A., Mr John Gough Nichols, F.S.A., Mr Howard Staunton, Mr Adam Black (publisher), Mr Sydney Dobell, Mr Thomas Miller (the basket-maker poet), Mr John Blackie (publisher), Mdlle Aimée Desclée, Mr W. H. Betty (the "youthful Roscius"), Dr Charles T. Beke, Mr Henry Godwin, F.S.A., Mr Charles Swain, John Moultrie (the poet), and Mrs Marsh-Caldwell.

From the world of art we have lost Mr John Pye (the "father of landscape engravers"), Mr Field Talfourd, Mr David Simson, of Edinburgh; Wilhelm von Kaulbach, of Munich; Mr W. Telbin, Mr Kenny Meadows, Mr J. H. Foley (the sculptor), Mr Robert Carlyle (miniature painter), the Baron de Triquiti, Mr Joseph Paton, and Mr Owen Jones.

Science has to lament the loss of Dr Neill Arnott, Dr Lankester, Sir John Rennie, Sir William Jardine, Dr Forbes Winslow; Maedler, the astronomer, of Hanover; Andreas Hansen, the astronomer, of Gotha; Mr Edward Blyth, the zoologist; Professor Phillips, of Oxford; Mr Richard Tamplin, the surgeon; Paolo Rosa, the Roman astronomer; and Professor Grant, of University College.

Our list of miscellaneous deaths includes Mdme Parepa-Rosa, Mr John Grantham, civil engineer and architect; Mr William Torr, the agriculturist; Mr Charles Young, the comedian; and Mr Addison, the comedian.

PADDY GREEN.

(From the "Daily Telegraph.")

"On the 12th instant, Mr John Green, late of Evans's, Covent-garden, aged 78." The death at a ripe old age of this genial veteran will be, no doubt, deeply lamented by a large circle of friends; but the memory of the late Mr Green merits something beyond a mere obituary notice. If not a very remarkable man himself—indeed, he did not claim to be anything more than an affable Boniface, who was eager to welcome the coming and to speed the parting guest, and whose smile, whose salutation of "Dear boy," and whose snuff-box, were at everybody's service—Mr John Green had certainly succeeded in making the famous cellar in Covent-garden Piazza, over whose nocturnal and strictly decorous revels he presided, the favourite place of resort not only of two generations of remarkable Englishmen, but of distinguished foreigners from all parts of the civilized world. We have not the slightest doubt that the late Emperor Napoleon III. had often partaken of a pinch from Mr Green's box, and it is on literary record that Mr Charles Sumner went at least on one occasion to Evans's with Mr Thackeray, with whom he had been dining at the Garrick Club, then situated in King-street, Covent-Garden. Who, indeed, had not been to the convivial souterrain? So widely was its fame known that there is little reason to regard as apocryphal the story of a Russian gentleman who arrived in this country with a solitary letter of introduction, which he said had been given to him by a Moldo-Wallachian friend on board a Danubian steamer. It was only a scrap of paper, on which were scrawled the words, "Evansechopsingsmokroom, Kovent-Gard." With the late Mr Green there is broken a link which connected the somewhat dreary and prosaic present with a very jovial and picturesque past. The Club element—the palatial and superfine club, we mean—is becoming more and more dominant in English society; and wits and barristers, guardsmen and country squires, are rarely to be found drinking grog and listening to songs in a tavern parlour. And it was a peculiar characteristic of the symposium over which Mr Green for so many years presided, that, great as were its lyrical attractions, and stately as were its later architectural adornments, it never became a music-hall, and never ceased to be a tavern of the old-fashioned order. Some thousands of good songs have been sung, and some thousands of good stories told, and pinches dispensed from the famous snuff-box at Evans's within the last forty years. Now the owner of the snuff-box himself returns to dust; and a sigh is due to the good-tempered manes of poor "Paddy Green."

M. Warot.—On leaving college, Victor Alexandre Joseph Warot, born at Verviers, on the 18th September, 1834, was articled to an attorney. He then studied for, and was admitted to, the bar. He practised a short time, but soon abandoned the law for commerce. He entered the bank of MM. Prost and Co., Paris, and stayed there till he went upon the stage. His father, the composer of several operas, and a professor of singing, guided him in his musical studies, and rendered it unnecessary for him to attend the course of instruction at the Conservatory. Under the patronage of Nestor Roqueplan, M. Warot first appeared at the Opéra-Comique, in 1858, the operas being Les Monténégrins and La Dame Blanche. In 1862, he sang in the revival of Zémire et Azor, his success being so great that M. Perrin at once engaged him for the Grand Opera, at first as a ténor léger, and then as a ténor fort. Being loaned by M. Perrin to M. Letellier, the manager of the Théâtre de la Monnaie, Brussels, he arrived in that capital in 1868, and, from the very commencement, received an extremely flattering reception. In 1869, he returned to the Grand Opera, Paris. Thence he proceeded, in 1870, to Marseilles, and then M. Vachot secured him for the Monnaie. This is the sixth season of his engagement in Brussels.—Journal Amusant.

THE WORCESTER MUSICAL FESTIVAL.—A conference between the Sub-committee of the Festival Stewards and the Dean and Chapter met in the Chapter House, at Worcester, on Saturday afternoon. After a full and free discussion of the views of each party, the meeting broke up, the entire question remaining in statu quo. The Dean and Chapter intimated their willingness to aid the Stewards in every way, should they ultimately arrange for subsequent Festivals in any secular building. The only absent member of the Chapter was the Rev. Canon Seymour, M.A. [And thus the silver lining in the Herald's cloud has resulted, as we prognosticated it would, in nothing. We have said from the beginning that the Dean and Chapter had long ago made up their minds; and why parley on? We would direct attention to a letter from a valued correspondent, "A Parson's Son," to be found in another column. His hint is very timely, and should be pondered over.—ED. M. N.]—Malvern News, Dec. 26.

Madame Carlotta Patti, M. Ritter, and M. Sivori have gone to Russia on a concert tour.

Don Giovanni has recently been played at Christiana, a place hitherto considered out of the range of Italian opera.

Signor Nicolini, detained en route to Paris, and unable to give his promised representations there, has left for Rome.

Madame Sangalli has arrived in Paris, to take part in Delibés's ballet, La Source, at the opening of the new Opera House.

M. Alexandre Billet, the eminent pianist, will resume his annual performances of classical pianoforte music early in January, at St George's Hall.

There has just been published, chez Michel Lévy, a very interesting work on Les Saltimbanques, by M. Gaston Escudier. The subject is not only very interesting, but very amusing; and many of our readers may like to have their attention called to the work.

Signor Arditi has been reaping laurels at the opera in Hanover, where he mounted, in one week, Così fan tutte, Il Matrimonio Segreto, and Don Pasquale. In the latter Madame Artôt introduced Signor Arditi's new waltz, "L'Incontro," which created quite a furore.

The Diritto says the Pope has taken up a project which he formed many years ago of placing 12 statues round the cupola of St Peter's, in accordance with the idea of Michael Angelo. Twelve sculptors are to be charged each with the execution of a statue, but they are not to be chosen by public competition; nor will any artist be eligible for the work who was not domiciled in Rome prior to 1870, or who has manifested any opposition to the cause of Holy Church. The Diritto adds that, seeing the enormous sums which are just now being poured into the Pontifical Treasury in the shape of Peter's pence, there should be no lack of funds for carrying out the project.

We wish to make all possible exceptions when we say that nothing can exceed the conceit and consequentialness of some Church choirs.—What with whispering, laughing, tipping back or lounging lazily in their chairs, sitting invisible behind the screens, or leaving church during sermon time, we venture to say that that half-dozen people who do the music are to be charged with more impertinence and misbehaviour than all the rest of the congregation. We would desire to have all proper respect for those privileged ladies and gentlemen who compose the choir, but there is really no reason why, having sung God's praise, they should then address themselves to offering incense to the devil. The wrangling among choirs is notorious and universal, but their amazing importance in many cases is not the less observable; and a really excellent choir, which is at the same time respectful and modest, indicates a remarkable triumph of grace and nature. There really ought to be no reason why those persons who are so charming with their voices, should often be so consequential and irreverent in their manners, and so utterly out of keeping with the place and the occasion.—Church and State.

WORCESTER MUSICAL FESTIVAL.—Petitions to the Queen in Council are being prepared by the council and the citizens of Worcester, praying that Her Majesty, "as the head of the Church of this realm, will be pleased to use her influence with the Dean and Chapter of Worcester to induce them to continue to permit the holding of the triennial Festivals in the Cathedral Church of the city, under such arrangements as will best promote the object in view." These petitions set out that musical Festivals have been held for 150 years at Worcester, Hereford, and Gloucester alternately; have been the means of providing charitable funds for the relief of widows and orphans of clergymen of these three dioceses; have been largely attended by the inhabitants, and even patronised by the Queen herself in 1830, and that the decision of the Dean and Chapter refusing the use of the Cathedral except for a Festival at which regular religious services and sermons would be held, has caused great dissatisfaction, and the petitioners believe "that the discontinuance of the Festival would tend to lower the character of this city in the estimation of enlightened and educated people, and be not only a local but also a national loss."

Is it not too bad of the Herald to assail Gluck's character by intimating that he was a garotter, as it did on Friday. Of course, that composer's gavottes were what our contemporary meant to allude to.—Arcadian.

ANTWERP.—The programme of the first concert this season given by the Society of Music contained works by three celebrated German composers; namely, the Chorus No. 1 from Judas Maccabeus, by Handel; a Cantata, by J. S. Bach; and the "Adventlied," by J. R. Schumann. There were also various compositions of less importance. The concert gave the greatest satisfaction to a most crowded audience.

THE VOICE & SINGING
BY
ADOLFO FERRARI.
THE FORMATION AND CULTIVATION OF THE VOICE FOR SINGING.
Price 12s.
London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, REGENT STREET, W.

"The remarkable qualities of this book are the author's freedom from conventional trammels, the strong sense of his opinions, and the novelty yet evident soundness of his precepts; his work has consequently come into general use as a manual of vocal instruction."—Daily News.

DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE,
For invigorating and enriching the voice, and removing affections of the throat.

DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE is universally acknowledged to be the most valuable remedy for sore throat, hoarseness and relaxed throat. It should always be taken before singing or reciting, as it strengthens the vocal organs. It is most extensively prescribed by the faculty for the throat and voice. Dr Lewis of Basingstoke says he finds them most efficacious, and in Dr Copland's Dictionary of Practical Medicine (Longman & Co.), they are strongly recommended at pages 872 and 1492. They are used by all the greatest vocalists and orators in Europe, and have been established over a quarter of a century. Testimonials from Patti, Grisi, Lablache, Santley, &c. Sold in boxes, 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d, by all Chemists throughout the United Kingdom and the Colonies.

"A naïve little song for a young girl is 'Little birdie, sing to me,' composed by Wilford Morgan. There is a melodious ring in this song that will please the ear."—Graphic.

"Mr Wilford Morgan's latest production, 'Little birdie, sing to me,' apparently aims at simplicity of melody and accompaniment, and has happily hit it."—Morning Post.

"'LITTLE BIRDIE, SING TO ME.'—Mr Wilford Morgan has just published another very pleasing song under the above title. It is a very fresh, bright melody, which might almost be signed Mendelssohn; and the accompaniment, while sufficient to sustain the voice, is extremely easy."—Era.

"A charming song, full of melody and sweetness, without being difficult to singers of moderate compass."—Hornet.

"From Messrs Duncan Davison & Co. we have a song by the well-known vocalist, Mr Wilford Morgan, 'Little birdie, sing to me,' a remarkably good and characteristic setting of some pretty, simple words."—Echo.

"A tuneful and pleasing ballad for a voice of average compass, effectively harmonized, although the pianoforte accompaniment presents but very few difficulties to the performer. 'Little birdie' contains all the elements of popularity, and should eventually become as popular as the composer's 'My sweetheart when a boy.'"—Sunday Times.

OPENING OF THE NEW OPERA HOUSE, PARIS.

(From the "Daily Telegraph," 4th January.)

To-morrow Paris will devote her municipal energies to the opening of the new Operahouse. When the sumptuous edifice facing the Rue de la Paix was to be consecrated to its artistic mission, and how that ceremony could best be carried out, were topics which had long agitated the Parisian mind. The claims of rival composers have been discussed so as to recall the days of Gluck and Piccini. Negotiations with popular, and, therefore, not easily satisfied artists, have been watched as though upon them depended the fate of a nation; and a stronger desire to witness the actual opening could not be shown did the proceedings involve a sensation trial for murder or the advent of a new dynasty. Upon the points which the Government has now authoritatively determined we have nothing to say. If French musicians are no more able to agree upon a worthy representative of their body than the French nation is able to decide upon a form of government—if there be no work in the imposing repertory of French national opera which all can accept as fitted for an august occasion, we may wonder, but not intervene. On the other hand, some explanation of the attendant phenomena may remove from the minds of English readers no small surprise, or, at any rate, disabuse them of false impressions. On our side of the Channel it would be impossible for any matter connected with art to acquire the importance with which Frenchmen have invested the opening of the New Opéra. Such a result is foreign to our instincts, and to all our ideas of the relative position artistic things should occupy in the economy of life. Wherefore not a few of us may be looking at our neighbours with mingled astonishment and contempt, putting their behaviour down to the eccentricity and incomprehensibleness of "French ways" in general. But it is doubtful whether, if we were in their place, even with our own somewhat cold and careless regard for art, we should be less moved than they. French operas can boast such proud achievements and such a brilliant history, extending over more than two hundred years, that it appeals with irresistible force, not only to artistic but national pride. It sheds lustre upon the entire country; and as an Englisman, who cannot tell an ironclad from a "gig," may be proud of the British Navy, so a Frenchman, whom no "concord of sweet sounds" can move, may glory in that which is, beyond all doubt, one of his nation's proudest boasts. But French opera has other claims. During its entire career it has been so intimately associated with the fortunes of France that a record of the one sheds no little light upon the annals of the other. Even its various names are landmarks in the course of the country's history. First known as the Académie Royale, then as the Académie Nationale, and next as the Académie Impériale, it has undergone the "strange mutation" of being all three over again, But the interweaving of French national life with the life of French opera is so close in more essential respects that it will be instructive to look at the matter somewhat in detail.

Oddly enough, French opera had an ecclesiastical origin. Urban VIII. is said to have recommended the importation of lyric drama into France; and it is certain that his Legate, Cardinal Bichi, directed the first performance of the first French work, "Akébar, Roi de Mogul;" the place being the episcopal palace of Carpentras, and the composer an Abbé Mailly. Another Abbé—Perrin—wrote the second opera, and to him the patent of the Académie Royale was originally granted. But this priestly influence over the young institution did not long endure. Emerging from the kitchen of Mdlle de Montpensier, Lulli appeared on the scene where he was so long to reign as undisputed chief. His connection with Molière, and that of his successor, Rameau, with Racine, thus early associated French opera and the most illustrious names in the country's literature; nor did the pick and flower of aristocracy refuse to take advantage of a clause in Louis XIV.'s patent which enacted that "all gentlemen and ladies may sing in the said pieces and representations of our Royal Academy without being considered for that reason to derogate from the titles of nobility, or from their privileges, rights, and immunities." During the Regency of the Duc d'Orleans, the Opéra became more closely connected with the State than ever on that account falling very low indeed. The Regent was often drunk at the performances, and his example found so many imitators that it became necessary to station an armed guard behind the scenes for the protection of the artists. At this time, moreover, the Opera House entered upon its career as a theatre of historic events. There the notorious Law was assailed by a furious mob of his dupes; there the unfortunate Charles Edward Stuart was arrested previous to being expelled from France in accordance with the Treaty of 1748; and there rancorously hostile parties fought out the only musical quarrel that ever rose to national importance. The struggle identified with the names of Gluck and Piccini seems now like some wild romance, but it was very real fifteen years before the Revolution began to occupy French society with graver matters. It arrayed Marie Antoinette against Madame du Barry in a fierce trial of strength; it divided into opposite camps such men as Suard, the Abbé Arnaud, Rousseau, Marmontel, La Harpe, and D'Alembert, and filled Paris with "envy, hatred, and all uncharitableness," not to speak of a literature which remains to this day a curious example of human folly. The second Opera House in the Palais Royal was destroyed by fire in 1781, not long after the growing insubordination of the French had found a strange outcome in the revolt of the artists against their manager, and the setting up of a republic. Its successor at the Porte St Martin took only eighty-six days to build, and there, for the next ten years, French opera found a home. But through much of that time it led a troubled life. The Parisians sternly ordered the house to be shut on the memorable day which saw the taking of the Bastille; and within its walls thay celebrated that great event by a scriptural melodrama, removed from Notre-Dame for convenience of representation. In June, 1791, the King having just fled from Paris, the Académie Royale became simply the Opéra; but when Louis signed the Constitution, the original name was restored, to endure, however, only fourteen days after a disgraceful tumult directed against the Queen, who, escaping with difficulty from the house, drove away amid showers of stones and mud. Then the Académie Royale de Musique became the Opéra National, and soon after witnessed an "offering to Liberty" in the shape of a free performance of Miltiades at Marathon, to celebrate "the death of the tyrant." At this point a different set of men appear on the troubled stage. Aristocracy, in the person of the Marquis de Louvois, takes to scene-shifting, while sansculottism, as represented by Hébert and Henriot, sits on the managerial throne, and encourages the artists by an occasional sight of the executioner at the wings. In 1794 the Opéra was removed to the Rue de Richelieu, and by the end of that year no fewer than sixteen persons in some way or other connected with the establishment suffered death, either by their own hands or by the guillotine.

The era of Napoleon associates French opera with the triumphs of Spontini and Cherubini, but chiefly with events of a very different character. It was at the house in the Rue de Richelieu that an attempt was to have been made upon the First Consul's life in October, 1800; and on his way thither two months later Fourrier's infernal machine spread death around without harm to its intended victim. While Moscow burnt around him, Napoleon issued a decree regulating the Académie Impériale, and to the Opéra he repaired on the very night of his return from the campaign which wrecked his fortunes. Two years had not passed before Alexander of Russia "commanded" a performance at the same house, and soon afterwards Louis XVIII. celebrated his triumphal entry into Paris with a grand representation of Œdipe à Colone. From this time till 1820 French opera flourished in comparative peace, but then a woful tragedy sealed the doom of the theatre in the Rue de Richelieu. On the steps of the building the Duc De Berri fell by an assassin's hand, and within its walls he received the last sacraments of the church—a concession made by the Archbishop of Paris only on the express understanding that the edifice should be razed to the ground. In this emergency the Académie Royale occupied the Théâtre Favart, pending the completion of the house in the Rue Lepelletier, which succumbed but recently to the flames. Here the greatest artistic triumphs of French opera were achieved. La Muette of Auber, the Siége de Corinthe and Guillaume Tell of Rossini, the Favorita of Donizetti, and Robert le Diable, Les Huguenots, and Le Prophète of Meyerbeer are names which readily suggest to the least informed reader of musical records a yet longer list of glorious successes. But the connection of national opera and national history had not ceased. A performance of La Muette fanned the spark which, bursting into a flame, scared Charles X. from the throne; and, coming nearer our own time, it was in front of the Théâtre de l'Opéra that Orsini made his desperate attempt on the life of the late Emperor Napoleon. The recent history of French national opera need not be entered upon, especially as the particulars we have cited suffice to prove that nothing in England occupies an analogous position, while it is equally clear that an institution so illustrious, and so closely interwoven with the varying fortunes of the State, which has played so striking a part in historic events, and at all times filled so great a place in the nation's eyes, may well attract to itself at the present juncture no mean regard.

Paris, January 4.

To-night the new Operahouse was opened here with great ceremony and a grand performance. The event, so far as English and French people were concerned, may be considered as an international one; for not only was the Prefect of the Seine present, but also the Lord Mayor and Lady Mayoress of London, together with the Sheriffs and their ladies, and the City functionaries, all dressed in uniform, and gallant in gold chains, buckles, and swords.

Besides these personages, however, their was a very brilliant assemblage. Marshal MacMahon, General Ladmirault, the King of Hanover, Queen Isabella, King Alfonso the Twelfth, the Count and Countess of Paris, and the Duc d'Aumale were all present, together with representatives of nearly all the departments of the State.

The place assigned to the Lord Mayor and his colleagues was one of the "avant-scènes des premières," or proscenium boxes, next to that occupied by Marshal MacMahon, these two having immediately opposite to them the boxes set apart to M. Buffet, the President of the National Assembly, and the Presidents of the Bureaux respectively. The first tier—or "premières loges"—was designated for the Corps Diplomatique, Chief Officers of State, and distinguished visitors. Included in this list were General de Cissey, General Vinoy, Marshal Regnault, M. Mathieu-Bodet, Duc Decazes, M. Batbie, the Comte de Paris, General Ladmirault, Marshal Canrobert, the Duchesse de Malakoff, M. de Cailloux, M. Grivart, M. Tailhand, the Duc de Broglie, M. le Royer, Queen Isabella, and the King of Hanover. The second tier was appropriated chiefly to officials of the State Departments, members of the Corps Diplomatique, military and naval officers, Members of the Institute, Presidents of Tribunals, Judges, and the Prefects of Police. It need scarcely be said that the scene presented by so grand an assemblage of brilliant uniforms and dresses was such that the coup d'œil from almost any part of the theatre exceeded anything that has been seen in Paris for years.

It was a drawback to the inauguration ceremony of this evening that both Mdlle Nilsson and M. Faure were unwell, so that neither of them was able to sing. In consequence of this disappointment, M. Halanzier issued the following revised programme:—

(1)	Overture of Masaniello	Auber.
(2)	First and Second acts of La Juive . .	Halévy.
(3)	Overture of William Tell	Rossini.
(4)	Blessing of the Daggers in The Huguenots .	Meyerbeer.
(5)	Second act of La Source	Delibes.

Still the whole affair may be pronounced a success, and the performance, which began shortly after seven o'clock, was cordially received, and the various acts warmly applauded. It should be added that almost all the more distinguished guests also received an ovation.

Last night the Lord Mayor, accompanied by the Lady Mayoress, Mr Alderman and Sheriff Ellis, Mrs Ellis, Mr Sheriff Shaw and Mrs Shaw, with two private friends, arrived at Boulogne at a quarter before seven o'clock, having had a calm passage, but being somewhat delayed, however, by the bar outside Boulogne Harbour, which prevented the boat from entering until after a delay of half an hour.

The Mayor of Boulogne awaited his colleague from London on the quay, and having received the travellers, gave an entertainment in a private room at the station.

Arrived in Paris, the Lord Mayor was met on the platform of the Chemin de Fer du Nord Station by the Prefects of the Seine and Police. A room had been fitted up for the reception, and here a number of complimentary speeches were made, after which the Lord Mayor and party repaired to the Hôtel Bristol.

This morning, M. Ferdinand Duval, the Prefect of the Seine, and M. Renault, Prefect of Police, waited on the Lord Mayor to apprise him that Marshal MacMahon would be happy to receive his Lordship at the Elysée at noon, and that a squadron of dragoons would escort him. The Prefects then repaired to the Elysée, to await the arrival of his Lordship, and a great crowd collected meanwhile in the neighbourhood of the Hôtel Bristol, admiring the sumptuous carriages of the civic dignitaries, and the gorgeous liveries of the servants who lounged about the entrance. The cordon was kept very carefully by the police, and as soon as the dragoons came prancing into the square, the procession began to form.

In the first carriage were Mr Vine, the Lord Mayor's secretary, and Mr Palmer Stone, the Lord Mayor's son. In the second rode Mr Sheriff Shaw, whose magnificent scarlet liveries evoked much admiration. In the third sat Mr Sheriff Ellis, his green liveries being equally conspicuous.

Lastly came the Lord Mayor. His Lordship's carriage was literally shining in purple and gold embroideries. It was preceded by his head usher in a cocked hat, immediately followed by four trumpeters in scarlet coats and black velvet hunting-caps. The Lord Mayor was accompanied by his Swordbearer and Macebearer, whose insignia quite impressed the spectators with their novelty.

The Lord Mayor, on making his appearance, was cheered with a warmth most unusual with French crowds. The anxiety to witness the procession was remarkable. From every window in the Place Vendôme the people were craning their necks to get a sight of the cortége, while the footpaths were so densely crowded as to be simply impassable. The equipages, especially that of the Chief Magistrate of the City, drawn by six horses, were much admired. As a spectacle it was certainly striking, and, fortunately, the sun shone out at the very moment when the procession started. Hats were lifted by all beholders during the entire route, which was down the Rue de la Paix, along the Rue de Rivoli, across the Place de la Concorde, up the Rue Royale and the Faubourg St Honoré to the Elysée.

On coming there the guard of honour presented arms, and the carriages drove into the inner courtyard, at the back of which a temporary antechamber has been erected for the forthcoming ball on the 13th of January. All the officials of the Elysée who are now in Paris were present to witness the arrival. Marshal MacMahon, attended only by his secretary, the Vicomte d'Harcourt, the Prefect of the Seine, and the Prefect of Police, awaited the Lord Mayor, the Sheriffs, and suite, in the yellow drawing-room on the first floor. The President of the Republic expressed great pleasure at seeing the Lord Mayor in Paris; to which his Lordship, through Lord Lyons, who acted as interpreter, replied by thanking the Marshal, in the name of the Municipality of the City of London, for the distinguished honour which had been done them by the French people in being invited to send representatives to be present at the inauguration of a building unequalled in modern times for grandeur of conception and splendour of execution. The Corporation of London always desired to be foremost not only in fostering the progress of art, but also in promoting international municipal relations as a means of spreading abroad the blessings of peace. In conclusion, he thanked the President, as representative of the French people, for the cordial reception which he and his colleagues had received from the citizens of Paris.

To this Marshal MacMahon responded that the alliance between the two nations had been securely cemented by the Crimean war, in which they had stood side by side—a war in which he himself had been engaged. For his own part he should always strive to increase the good feeling existing between the two countries.

In the afternoon, after the Lord Mayor and Sheriffs had taken lunch at the Hôtel Bristol, where they were joined by the Prefects of the Seine and of the Police, the Lady Mayoress, Mrs Ellis, Mrs Shaw, and Mr Campbell Clarke, his Lordship returned in his state carriage to the Elysée, escorted by a squadron of dragoons. The streets were again lined as thickly as in the morning, the Faubourg Saint Honoré being densely crowded. The Duchess of Magenta personally received the Lady Mayoress and suite, conversing for some time in the purest English, until the arrival of Marshal MacMahon, when her Ladyship was introduced to the President. Madame la Maréchale kindly invited her visitors to the grand ball, an invitation, however, which they were unable to accept. To-morrow the Lord Mayor will visit Lord Lyons, the Prefect of the Seine, Prefect of Police, and all the Ministers. On Friday his Lordship is to entertain a distinguished company at dinner, and on Saturday he will dine with the Prefect of the Seine.

MUSIC AT SAN FRANCISCO.

(From our Correspondent.)

Last week the benefit concert of Mdlle Elzer was quite a success, and Platt's Hall drew a full and fashionable audience. The programme was complete, and the ladies and gentlemen who assisted at the concert were encouragingly received. Mdlle Elzer and Miss Ivy Wandesforde carried off the honours. Both ladies were encored—the first in "The Alpine Flowers," and the second in "The Spell," from Wallace's Lurline. Madame Fabri sang the aria, Fidelio (Beethoven), with effect; and Mr Foges did better in the romanza from Weber's Euryanthe than on any other occasion. The quartet from William Tell was massacred through the disintonation of Mr Foges, and in which Miss Post took a conspicuous part. The lady, although very young, promises to become a good soprano, with diligent study. Mr Julius Hinrichs, an aspirant on the violoncello, although very young also, played a romanza from Schubert with great taste, in which he was encored. Mr Mansfeldt was better in his piano solo than as an accompanist—plainly evident when he accompanied Mdlle Elzer in her encore of "Kathleen Mavourneen," although the words were imperfectly pronounced.

On last Tuesday (the 1st) a concert was given by Miss Alice and brother Louis Schmidt. The Platt's Hall was not full. Mr Louis Schmidt played better on this occasion than when we heard him before. Still he has to study a great deal more to become a solo player. His best effort was the "Fantasia appassionata" of Vieuxtemps, in which he was recalled. Miss Alice played selections on the piano from Schumann and Mendelssohn with some expression, although too young to understand the different phrases of the authors. Miss Bentler posesses a good voice, and used it to its best advantage in the "Spring Song," with violin accompaniment by Louis Schmidt, senior. Mr Davidowitz made his first appearance in the aria, "Vieni la mia vendetta," from Lucrezia; he was not very favourably received. The opening and closing pieces, septet and quintet (instrumentalists) were well received.

Last Thursday was for the benefit of Miss Wandesforde. This young lady goes to Europe to finish her musical education. She has a pleasing soprano voice, and, we have no doubt, by constant study, after a lapse of years, will become a great singer. The King of Hawaia was present, according to promise. The hall was quite full, and attended by the leading artists of the city. The Hawaian song was rendered by the beneficiaire, Miss Elzer, and Madame Fabri. The latter sang Strauss's waltz with effect. Although somewhat advanced in age, she still retains the vocalization of an artist of an excellent school. Miss Wandesforde rendered Rossini's "Non giunge," from Sonnambula, with great effect as a young artist; and we have no doubt, by her trip to Europe, and with a good master, she will become an artist of a high order, but her voice requires much training. In the grand aria from Les Huguenots she was much applauded, and both of her songs were encored. Herr Schott proved himself a complete artist on the French horn, and his two solos were unanimously encored. Miss Elzer did well in her song, although persisting in forcing her voice in the middle tones to such an extent that it becomes annoying to the ear. The song, "Mountaineer," by Mr Makin, was well received.

All the artists here are on tiptoe at the expected arrival of Madame Arabella.

VAN PRAAG.

San Francisco, December 6, 1874.

MUSIC AT BERLIN.

To the loudly expressed regret of the patrons of the Royal Operahouse, Madlle Minnie Hauck has concluded her present engagement by appearing a second time as the heroine in M. Ambroise Thomas's Mignon. The audience were as much delighted with her as ever. She is to return in October to give another series of "starring" performances, and then she is to enter on a regular engagement of six months annually for several years. The fair American has now left for Weimar.

Madlle Elsa Keller, a contralto from the Leipsic Stadttheater, has produced a favourable impression as Ortrud in Herr R. Wagner's Lohengrin. Another member of the same company, Herr Ernst, is to appear during the present month. He will open as Adolar, in Weber's Euryanthe, and if successful will be offered an engagement. In June, Mad. Minna Wagner-Ueberhorst, prima donna at the Stadttheater, Nuremberg, will also sing with a view to an engagement.

The works to be revived this season at the Royal Operahouse will include Ernani, Lucrezia Borgia, Das Feldlager in Schlesien, Armida, Fernand Cortez, and Iphigenia in Aulis. Nothing, however, is heard about M. Anton Rubinstein's grand opera, Die Maccabäer, which was announced as one of the novelties in store for the public.

Giroflé-Girofla has been produced at the Friedrich-Wilhelmstädtisches Theater, on a scale of magnificence as regards dresses and scenery previously unknown at this establishment. It is not likely, however, to prove nearly as successful as its predecessor, Mad. Angot. The music is pronounced agreeable and pleasing, but great exception is taken to the libretto, which the critics declare to pass, in many instances, the limits of propriety. They assert, moreover, that the last two acts are utterly deficient in interest. The singing and acting are good. Madlle Meinhardt acquits herself well in the dual impersonation of Giroflé and Girofla, and is admirably supported by Herr Swoboda in the principal male character. The other artists, also, namely:—Mesdles Preuss, Csepsanyi, Herren Neumann and Schulz, are entitled to a word of praise. The chorus gets through its task without a hitch, and Herr Kleffel proves himself an efficient conductor; but, as already mentioned, the libretto is deemed objectionable, and Giroflé-Girofla will not, probably, figure long in the bills.

A new theatre, the Friedrichstädter Theater, has been opened in the Friedrichsstrasse, by Herr Bente. This is the third theatre here specially dedicated to comic opera. The conductor is Herr Steinemann, who has already filled the same post in Posen, Aix-la-Chapelle, Dusseldorf, and other towns of Germany. The opera selected for the opening night was Lortzing's Czaar und Zimmermann.

Speaking in the Voss'sche Zeitung of one of the Reichshallen Concerts, Professor G. Engel says:—

"The fact that an air by Haydn was included, on this occasion, in the programme, affords us an opportunity of remarking that Haydn and Mozart—nay, in a certain sense, even Beethoven—are pretty well unrepresented at the concerts of the Reichshallen, as well as at those of the Concerthaus. Those concerts, therefore, which have made their influence most felt in the life of the masses, neglect almost entirely the classical side of art. This fact is interesting; and, in order to be in a position to establish it more positively, we shall henceforward watch very narrowly the concerts at the above places, even though we have no other motive for attending them."

CINCINNATI.—A movement has been set on foot by some of the leading German inhabitants to establish a first-rate German theatre here, with two distinct companies, one dramatic and the other operatic. Herr von Garay, the manager of Lichtmay's opera company, has expressed himself ready to start such a theatre, and give seven performances a week, provided a sufficient sum be raised as a guarantee. Ten thousand dollars have already been subscribed.

FLORENCE.—Sig. Scalaberni has issued his prospectus for the Carneval and Lent season at the Pergola. He promises three operas: Il Guarany, by Sig. Gomez; Luigi XI. (new), music by Sig. Luca Fumagalli; and Dolores, by Sig. Auteri Manzocchi. The operatic company will include Signore Borghi-Mamo, Ferni; Signori Villona, Boncori, Brogi, and Falcheri. The ballets will be Le Figlie di Cheope and La Devadacy, both by Sig. Monplaisir, and supported by Signori Passani, Boni, Scaletta, Vergani, Rossi, Massato, Signori Spadolino, Fissi, Croci, and others of less note in the choreographic world. Signori Mabellini and Roncagli will be the conductors.

SOMETHING ABOUT THE ABBÉ VOGLER.

After Sketches furnished by Contemporaries.

BY JOST VAN DER LÜCHTEN.*

In April, 1786, a Bremen correspondent says:—

"The Abbé Vogler is now come here. He is no less a charlatan here than elsewhere. Unbounded bragging about his Theory of Music, and about his new System of Harmony, which he says have the approbation of the Academies of Science in Paris and London, and a thousand other shameless boasts, which can come only from a fevered brain, and (I feel almost inclined to say), a neglected heart, are employed by him here, as everywhere else, to deceive the lovers of music. Generally, too, he attains his object. Last week, he played the Cathedral Organ, for the benefit of the Poor and of St Peter's Orphan Asylum. He gave us from a large collection: 1. The Death of Duke Leopold; 2. A musical imitation of The Day of Judgment, by Rubens;† 3. All kinds of organ pieces, with imitations of other instruments, and all kinds of childish nonsense. In the Day of Judgment, according to the announcement, which I enclose, with some others from Lubeck and Hamburgh, the following things were to be expressed: 1. Magnificent Introduction. 2. The Trombone re-echoes through the graves—they open. 3. The incensed Judge pronounces the dreadful Sentence upon those who are rejected. Their Fall (!) into the Abyss.—Gnashing of Teeth and Wailing (!). 4. God takes the Righteous into Bliss—their Ecstacy (!) 5. The Voices of the Blessed unite with the Choruses of the Angels (!) Among the miscellaneous pieces was comprised: 'The Joys of Pastoral Life, interrupted by a Thunderstorm,' which, however, passes over. Then naïve and gentle delight thereat.‡ At last a Martial Symphony, with beating of drums, marches, firing of cannon, etc. You cannot think how disgusting all this was on a beautiful large organ, and in a church, where we should have dignity, seriousness, and solemnity. Yet nearly all the public was enchanted.—People had often wondered, not without reason, why the Abbé Vogler always played for the benefit of the Poor. Here we discovered his little game. It is, you must know, a bait, and, at the same time, a plan for obtaining permission to use the organ, which permission would, most probably, be otherwise refused in many places. When his organ-concert was finished, and the churchwardens asked for the money taken, he declared that he could play only for the benefit of Catholic Poor, and not of Lutheran or Reformed Poor. He should, therefore, he said, himself keep the money until he had an opportunity of distributing it among the Poor of his own faith. To the Poor of this place he gave only a trifle."

From this account, any impartial person may glean much, very much, especially if he does not forget to read between the lines. In another letter, of May, 1786, from the same place, the writer says:—

"A day or two ago, I received from Lubeck the enclosed announcements issued by the Abbé Vogler, who is at present stopping there, and has been playing the organ in several of the churches. He is going on in Lubeck just as he went on with us. You best see this from the advertisements. The piece which pleased me most was his Sea Fight, in which he imitates: 1. The beating of drums (I never heard that drums were beaten in naval engagements); 2. Martial music and marches; 3. The motion of the ships; 4. The heaving of the waves; 5. The firing of cannon; 6. Shrieks of the wounded; 7. Victorious shouts of the triumphant fleet, etc. As a proof of the success he has achieved here with his insipid and childish nonsense, I will copy for you the account written by a man who fancies himself no bad judge of music, and inserted in the Hamburgischer Korrespondent:—

"'Bremen, 5th April, 1786.—The Ecclesiastical Councillor and first Chapelmaster of the Bavarian Palatinate, Vogler, has given us a specimen here of his masterly art in handling, and—so to speak—commanding the organ. In obedience to repeated solicitations, he will defer his departure for Hamburgh, and essay to depict the Day of Judgment, after Rubens, and the death of Leopold, Duke of Brunswick.'"

After a tolerably long-winded disquisition, not, however, exactly interesting to readers of the present day, on Justinius Knecht, who occupied the same position with regard to Vogler which Nohl does with regard to Wagner and Liszt, the Bremen correspondent continues thus:—

"The approbation of the two most enlightened nations in the world (France and England) does not amount to much after all. In Paris, he was an object of ridicule. The goddesses of the Operahouse played him tricks, when he insisted in the most pressing manner on producing an opera there, at last pushing matters so far that the management had to grant him at least a rehearsal. The opera* was rejected, and, at rehearsal, the lady singers burnt their music, tore the silk abbé's-cloak off his back, and played off on him a hundred other jokes, indicative of anything but profound respect. In England his name is unknown. At least, it is certain that he created no stir there, or I should find his name in one or other of the many English journals, which I have frequently glanced through, always paying particular attention to art intelligence. For this nation he is far too great a braggart. Though, it is true, the English sometimes are pleased with mere jangle, they require that it shall be backed up with something or other.—A short time since a 'Miserere'† of his was engraved. It contains the most vapid and repulsive modulations possible. How can a man possessing so little correct feeling for purity of musical composition, as nearly all his works prove that he possesses, form a system of harmony, calculate modulations, and exhaust their possible number? With the 'Miserere,' there is a short explanation published, which it is impossible to read without laughing at several passages of it. We know Vogler's style: turgid, deficient in precision of expression (just like his ideas), and, moreover, crammed with exceedingly laughable and tasteless epithets. It is a shame that anyone should have confided to a man with so confused a brain, and with such an absence of clear and correct ideas, the task of getting up the musical articles in the Frankfort German Encyclopædia, just as—in the said explanation of the 'Miserere' 'Cor contritum—a crushed heart is depicted in a lively manner, in a series of heart-throbs, by the basses, as well as the swarm of choristers who rush upon divine compassion'—and many other strange utterances, must provoke laughter rather than aught else. This is precisely the effect of the articles in the Encyclopædia. They disfigure the whole work."

We will close this article with a communication (probably written by Forkel) from Göttingen, as it throws a still more peculiar light upon certain parts of Vogler's character. It is dated August, 1785.

"As Vogler has been here as well as in other places, and played both the organ and the piano; as, moreover, we have had the opportunity of becoming better acquainted with him from personal intercourse, and consequently are in a position, perhaps, as well from his writings as from personal knowledge, to judge him more impartially than any one else, we will say what we know, without troubling ourselves whether other criticisms of him are refuted, or (as we almost fear) corroborated thereby. Of his System of Harmony, and the approbation bestowed on it by the two Academies of London and Paris, he did not say a word here, and we know generally that he has spoken about it only to such persons as he is certain understand nothing about such matters.‡ Göttingen, indeed, is a very unfavourable place for dreamers of any kind. With the exception of some few sensitive individuals, there is no one here whom they could inflame with their ardour. We are, perhaps, a little too cold. Vogler, at any rate, soon appeared to remark that this was not the place for him. He behaved, consequently, like a reasonable being, visited with the writer various professors, spoke badly nowhere, and pleased everywhere. This time, there was nothing more for him to do. So he went away. In August of the (following‖) summer, however, he re-appeared, formed the acquaintance of an amiable young prince and several gentlemen of good family. He explained to all of them his System of Harmony, and would assuredly have played here, also, the part he has played in so many large towns, if, as before said, this had been the place for it. He wrote in the album of a young nobleman, who is passionately fond of music:—

"'1 ½ ⅓ harmonic proportion,
"'1 3 5 arithmetical proportion,
"'the first according to origin and the second according to position. The "'latter does not supersede the former, but changes the appearance. Let
"'such be the relation of your soul (harmonious amateur), and the supple-
"'ness of your actions (loyal friend). 'Vogler.'"

Let any one, who can, understand this transcendent specimen of imbecility. I believe that even the learned scholars of the Kladderadatsch, subtle as they are, would be in this instance obliged to confess themselves incompetent. From what has been adduced, however, in combination with Vogler's theoretical phantasms and eccentric compositions, we may well be entitled to assert that the world-celebrated Abbé, in a moral as well as in an artistic sense, was nothing more nor less than—a great Ciarlatano!

* From the Neue Berliner Musikzeitung.

† These two noisy productions were, by the way, the principal show-pieces at the Abbé's concerts.

‡ The reader will recollect what was said at the beginning of this article concerning the model for the Pastoral. The pictures of Vogler and Knecht may have "suggested," but they certainly never served as "models" for the Pastoral, just as little as Paer's Leonore could be the model for Fidelio, though both scores illustrated musically the same subject.

ROYAL ALBERT HALL CONCERTS.

(From the "Musical Times," Jan. 1.)

The unique experiment, which, since November 7, has been made in the Royal Albert Hall, may now be said to have furnished the data necessary for future guidance, and to have reached a stage where the term "experiment" hardly applies. It was necessarily begun under conditions purely speculative, because nothing of the kind had ever been attempted before. The directors, whom some have blamed for their imprudence, and others praised for boldness, had to advance over the boundary of unexplored region, with nothing more certain to guide them than that by no means infallible process called arguing the unknown from the known. Several things were necessarily assumed in order to make a start at all with the slightest hope of success. Thus, it was assumed that the public would go to the Albert Hall in sufficient numbers, tempted by a weekly programme arranged to please all tastes from the most refined to the most "popular." It was anticipated, further, that they would do this with a promptitude great enough to warrant a hope of ultimate success before the sacrifice, inevitable at the outset, had become too great. And it was further expected that the carefully disposed artistic resources at command would prove equal to the enormous strain of daily concerts. But an assumption, however strong, has yet to bear the test of experience, and if any of those just named have failed to pass the ordeal, the directors, though they may regret the fact, cannot reproach themselves. The scheme of the Albert Hall Concerts was a grand one, worthy of this musical age, and was worked with a faithfulness and devotion that from the first placed the result, no matter how disastrous, in the category of misfortunes which have nothing to do with faults. Safe on this score, the directors need not fear to confess that, while the experience of seven weeks has shown their enterprise, as a whole, to be founded upon an estimate of facts that erred only in being too sanguine, the results, as a whole, point emphatically to the need of material change. They cannot refuse to believe that, even under present arrangements, the scheme would become self-supporting in process of time, for it has always been observed that enterprises of such "pith and moment" are sure to create their own public. But the vastness of the undertaking makes the process of working up to this result one of very serious responsibility—such responsibility, in point of fact, as should only be incurred by a public organization, or with a guarantee of State aid. Nor is this the only consequence of the seven weeks' teaching. The directors have now become thoroughly acquainted with the exigences of the vast building in which their concerts are given, and with the limit within which the resources it exacts can be worked with the best results. The highest wisdom is shown in profiting by experience, and the directors of the Albert Hall Concerts do no more than justice to themselves and to their enterprise by frankly making the changes which seem to them necessary. What those changes are has now to be succintly told.

In the first place, the number of concerts per week will be reduced from six to two, and, as a matter of course, the opportunities for careful preparation thus afforded will be used to their utmost extent.

Secondly, it is the intention of the directors to increase the number both of band and chorus, bringing each up to the strength necessary for the best effects attainable, in the huge area devoted to the performances. The wisdom of this course needs no demonstration.

Thirdly, it is proposed to cover the same ground as that occupied by the series of concerts now ended, doing so by the following arrangement. One concert in each week will be devoted to the popular music hitherto presented on Monday and Saturday evenings, special care being taken that the term "popular" shall have a liberal signification as regards good and improving works. One concert in each alternate week will be devoted to oratorio, given up to the present on Thursday evenings, and one to the orchestral music which, under the daily scheme, supplied programmes for Tuesday, Wednesday, and Friday. With regard to oratorio, it need only be said that the great standard works will be presented under materially improved conditions and with the utmost possible completeness. With reference to the orchestral music, the directors, while paying requisite attention to the claims of classical works, will not neglect those of modern writers, whether English or foreign. The liberality and comprehensiveness which have hitherto marked their operations will continue to do so; and no pains will be spared whenever new aspirants for favour are introduced to public notice. The personnel of the enterprise will remain unchanged as regards the principal artists, save that fresh and important engagements are contemplated, and here the directors have much pleasure in announcing that the eminent violinist, Herr Wilhelmj, will make an early début at the Royal Albert Hall, after several years' absence from England. Other distinguished artists will follow him, and it is believed that the magnitude and completeness of the performances cannot fail to secure the warm sympathy and support of the musical public.

There only remains to add, that the concerts will be resumed on January 19th, and continue until Easter.

Brescia.—A new theatre is to be built here very shortly.

Dusseldorf.—Herr Scherbath has been chosen manager, for a term of three years, of the new Stadttheater, now fast approaching completion. He was for a considerable period manager of the old theatre, in which position he gave great satisfaction.

Mayence.—The programme of the first of this season's Symphonie-Concerts, at the Stadttheater, under the direction of Herr Preumayr, included Schumann's "Overture, Scherzo, and Finale" (Op. 52); the 1st Movement from Molique's Violoncello Concerto, and Mozart's Adagio for the same instrument (both pieces being played by Herr Vollrath, from Wiesbaden); Gade's Overture to Hamlet, and Beethoven's Symphony in A minor. The vocalist was Madlle Gayer, who sang an air from Spohr's Jessonda.

Posen.—The erection of the Polish Theatre here is proceeding very slowly, if, indeed, it has not absolutely come to a standstill for want of funds. It appears that there is a feeling of strong opposition among the higher classes of Polish society against the theatre, because it is asserted that the Polish stage has exerted a baneful influence upon young Poles belonging to the above classes. By those, however, who entertain different opinions, all sorts of schemes have been proposed to finish the building. One of the plans suggested is that every son of Poland shall devote to the completion of the edifice the first three of the new one-mark pieces he may happen to receive.

Brussels.—The Christmas festivities, which attracted a large number of visitors to this capital, proved a godsend to M. Campocasso, who has had the somewhat unusual pleasure of seeing the Théâtre de la Monnaie full, night after night. The works given have been Guillaume Tell, Faust, and La Muette.—La Perle du Brésil is still being actively rehearsed, under the personal superintendence of the composer, M. Félicien David, who has been staying here for some little time. The cast is, as things go, a good one, and the Municipality have contributed a large sum for dresses and decorations, so there is a tolerable chance that the work will prove a success. In addition to La Perle du Brésil, the public of the Monnaie are, before the termination of the season, to be treated to Die Zauberflöte and a series of representations by Mad. Nilsson.—M. Campocasso's successors in the management are M. Stoumon and Calabrési, to whom the Municipal Council have ceded the theatre, from the 1st May next, for three, six, or nine years, either party being at liberty to determine the contract at the conclusion of any one term of three years.

Milan.—The season at the Scala was inaugurated, on the 26th ult., by M. Gounod's Romeo e Giulietta, and a classical ballet, entitled Giulio Cesare. The opera was very well performed; singers, chorus, orchestra—all acquitted themselves well. Signora Mariani, who sang three years ago at the Scala in Der Freischütz, made an excellent Giulietta; and Sig. Bolis an effective Romeo. They were creditably supported by Signora Tatti, as the Page, Sig. Pantaleoni as Capuleto, and Sig. Strozzi as Mercuzio. The dresses were splendid and original, but the scenery, except the Square at Verona, and Giulietta's Cabinet, far from creditable. The stage-business proved that in Herr Böhm, who comes either from Pesth or Prague, the impresario has at length discovered that "rara avis in terris," a good stage-manager. The ballet was an utter failure, despite its magnificent mise-en-scène, rich costumes, and the exquisite dancing of Signora Fioretti, whose efforts alone were rewarded with hearty applause, while every other person and every other thing in Giulio Cesare were greeted with unequivocal disapprobation.—M. Offenbach reigns supreme at the Dal Verme and the Castelli.

The Musical World,

LONDON, SATURDAY, JANUARY 9, 1875.

NEWS comes to us from Bayreuth, where the Festival Theatre of Herr Richard Wagner keeps up its legitimate business of swallowing the money of Herr Richard Wagner's friends. As at present calculated, the monster will be gorged by the spring of next year—in other words, the house will be finished, and everything ready for the performances which are to result in the artistic salvation of the world. Nous verrons. Repeated postponements make cautious people dubious; and they will believe in the opening of the Bayreuth theatre only when it has taken place. For ourselves, we trust sincerely that nothing will further put off so desirable a consummation. Hope deferred may make the heart sick even unto death, and we do not want to lose our Richard. Far from it. We want our Richard to live long, and write, if not more operas, more letters to his friends, full of the hard hitting which gives even his foes delight, because it is so well done. As, therefore, he cannot yet be spared, let him realise the dream of years, and let the Festival Theatre be opened in due time.

But our news from Bayreuth is of a more particular kind than any question of dates. Herr Richard, it seems, is resolved that the audience at his Festival performances shall be a real audience, and not a mere gathering of folk who stare at each other as much as at the stage. Such is the influence he exerts that he might probably secure this result by placarding the house with "You are requested not to take your eyes off the stage." But Wagner—if not from experience, from observation—knows the weakness of human nature, and can understand the supreme necessity of the prayer, "Lead us not into temptation." The eye, like the tongue, is an unruly member, given to wandering, and taking the mind with it. Moreover, Herr Wagner appreciates the fact that he himself—he, the Richard of Richards—will be there to absorb the reverent attention of the multitude, and fix their gaze. But the performances are not to suffer from any such counter attraction. To the audience there will be the stage and nothing but the stage, just as to the congregation in a convict chapel there is the parson, and nothing but the parson. Richard, in point of fact, means to box his friends in so that they can see nothing but what they ought to see. Each man will, for the nonce, be encelluled,—cut off from the world by half-inch deal, and with no outlook save into the land of romance bounded by the stage. Bold and daring Richard! May your shadow never be less!

But is this all? Nay, verily. We can supplement the Bayreuth news with much more conceived in the same spirit. Here, for example, are the terms upon which admission to the Festival performances will alone be granted:—

I. All persons desirous of attending are candidates for admission as a favour, and not as a right.

II. Money, though very much wanted, is the slightest qualification for admission. Art is not honoured by groes, material offerings.

III. All candidates must make solemn oath that there is but one true opera, and that Wagner is its prophet.

IV. All candidates must be prepared to pass an examination in German legends, and to give evidence that he has for a year past read nothing else.

V. All candidates must solemnly declare their belief that the said legends are not only the fit associates of art, but are, in themselves, edifying, refining, and calculated to strengthen the natural modesty of young people.

VI. All candidates must wear an appropriate dress, so as to present outward and visible harmony with the subject of the opera.

VII. All candidates must submit to be searched as a guarantee against the use of wool in the ears—that being strictly forbidden.

VIII. A scale of fines will be rigidly enforced against all who sneeze, cough, blow their noses, or otherwise show a want of mental and bodily absorption in the performance.

IX. Persons detected in the act of speaking to each other, or themselves, will at once be turned out of the theatre.

X. Any person expressing disapprobation will be promptly handed over to the police of his Bavarian Majesty.

XI. Those who approve, and are ready to abide by these rules, may at once send their money, accompanied by a filled-up form (to be had at "all the libraries"), stating their full name, address, and profession; their opinions on things in general, and a certificate of their baptism.

Having thus prepared his audience, and boxed them in, there will be triumph in Bayreuth next year. May we see it.

HERR JOACHIM is expected in London about the 12th of next month. London will open its arms to embrace him.

WE hear on good authority that Mr Arthur Sullivan has an opera in hand, the libretto of which is the work of a gentleman who boasts a "handle to his name."

MDLLE MARIE KREBS was to have arrived in London yesterday, to fulfil her engagement at the Monday Popular Concerts. Everybody will have a welcome for "little Marie."

OCCASIONAL NOTES.

One day, a gentleman in Brussels asked Servais to come and drink tea with him. Servais refused for a long time, but at length, after great pressing, altered his mind, and promised to come. "Bring your violin with you," said the gentleman, smilingly. "Thank you," replied Servais, "my violin never takes tea."

The set of bells at the new Paris Operahouse will consist of ten. They will not constitute a regular scale, but will agree with the melody of the various operas, such as Les Huguenots, Hamlet, Der Freischütz, Robert le Diable, etc., in which they will be employed. Of course it was necessary that they should be very accurate; but so admirably were they cast by M. Dubuisson Gallois, that one only out of the ten had to have anything done to it after it emerged from the mould. The following is a list giving the note, weight, and diameter of each bell, from the largest to the smallest:—F, 820 kilogrammes, 1·11 metres; F sharp, 760 kilos, 1·05 metres; B, 280 kilos, ·78 metres; C, 230 kilos, ·70 metres; E, 120 kilos, ·56 metres; F, 85 kilos, ·5 metres; F sharp, 71 kilos, ·48 metres; G, 59 kilos, ·44 metres; A, 41 kilos, ·4 metres; B flat, 40 kilos, ·4 metres.

Mr Planché was the originator of that zeal for accurate stage costume and decoration which has been since carried to so preposterous a pitch that, in many instances, every other consideration has been sacrificed to it. The first impulse was given to such revivals by the production of King John in 1824, thus amusingly referred to by the veteran dramatist himself in his Recollections and Reflections:—

"Never shall I forget the dismay of some of the performers when they looked upon the flat-topped chapeaux de fer (fer blanc, I confess) of the twelfth century, which they irreverently stigmatised as stewpans. Nothing but the fact that the classical features of a Kemble were to be surmounted by a precisely similar abomination would, I think, have induced one of the rebellious barons to have appeared in it. They had no faith in me, and sulkily assumed their new and strange habiliments, in the full belief that they should be roared at by the audience. They were roared at; but in a much more agreeable way than they had contemplated. When the curtain rose, and discovered King John dressed as his effigy appears in Worcester Cathedral, surrounded by his Barons sheathed in mail, with cylindrical helmets and correct armorial shields, and his courtiers in the long tunics and mantles of the thirteenth century, there was a roar of approbation, accompanied by four distinct sounds of applause, so general and so hearty, that the actors were astonished, and I felt amply rewarded for all the trouble, anxiety, and annoyance I had experienced during my labours. Receipts of from £400 to £600 nightly soon reimbursed the management for the expense of the production, and a complete reformation of dramatic costume became from that moment inevitable upon the English stage."

We read in the Gazzetta di Bergamo, says the Gazzetta Musicale:—

"We know that our celebrated maestro Mayr presented, during his lifetime, to the City Library, a collection of highly valuable musical works, historical and periodical, etc., consisting altogether of about 400 volumes. A pendant to this generous act was the gift made, at the celebrated musician's death, by his son-in-law, Sig. Luigi. Massinelli of Bonate, who presented the Congregation of Charity with a Mass and Vespers, complete, composed by Mayr, written in his own hand, and selected, as two of his best compositions, by Sig. Dolci, who is now dead, and Sig. Bernardino Zanetti, who is still alive. Sig. Massinelli now enriches the City and honours his celebrated father-in-law by making a far more munificent gift to the Library of Bergamo, so that neither the liberality of the donor nor the good which will accrue from his gift can be sufficiently praised."

The gift in question is Mayr's musical library, consisting of some 1,600 works, all numbered. Writing on the subject to the Gazzetta di Bergamo, Professor Alessandri, the Librarian, says:—

"The gift of Mayr's Library by Sig. Massinelli is a fact of really extraordinary importance. It will be sufficient for me to state that in the Library figure the names and principal works—very many having become rare—of the greatest masters, foreign as well as Italian, from the year 1500, beginning with Allegri, Scarlatti, Palestrina, Marcello, etc., proceeding with Durante, Leo, Pergolese, Gluck, Jomelli, Haydn, Paisiello, Cimarosa, etc., and continuing with Winter, Zingarelli, Mozart, Cherubini, Lesueur, Méhul, Beethoven, Paër, Spontini, Fétis, Boieldieu, Weber, etc., down to Rossini, Bellini, Mercadante, and Donizetti, Mayr's contemporaries. Of this music a very great deal is in score, all being in good condition, and printed or beautifully copied, many of the copies, wonderful to say, in the laborious hand of Mayr himself.—If we seek in Mayr's Library to gratify our feeling of patriotism, we shall find in Marenzo, Mazzocchi, Giovanelli di Gaudino (Section xvii), Lenzi, Salari, Pezzoli, Manghenoni, and others, proofs of the care with which music was always cultivated in Bergamo. If we look for musical methods, treatises and theories, we shall find a considerable number. If we look for precious relics, we have, not to mention others, some of incomparable value, as well in an entire unpublished oratorio on the Assumption (1820) as in other and smaller autograph compositions of our great Donizetti, even the smallest being important for the grand master's artistic biography, and because they prove his affection for Mayr, whom he always loved and venerated, we know, as his master, benefactor, friend, nay, more: as a most fondly cherished father."

MADLLE MARIE KREBS AT LEIPSIC.

Yesterday's concert in the Gewandhaus, for the benefit of the Orchestral Pension Fund, introduced to us some dear old acquaintances, and likewise some new ones, no less welcome. Among the former we reckon L. v. Beethoven's C minor Concerto, performed by Madlle Marie Krebs, who is one of the latter—at least in our Leipsic concerts. We have, however, heard a great deal of the fair young artist elsewhere during the last few years. It was with the same Concerto by Beethoven, and with the Concerto in E flat, that she achieved a brilliant triumph at the New Philharmonic Concerts, London, last April. No later than January, she will visit England again to occupy the principal position at the Monday Popular Concerts, during the latter half of the present season, as Joachim and Mad. Neruda did at the end of the last, and Herr von Bülow at the commencement of this. Well, we wish her every kind of good fortune! They were not wrong in inviting her over as a "Beethoven Player." She is one. Characterized by two qualities as indispensable for the proper rendering of Beethoven's productions as experience proves them, when combined, to be unusual, namely: the utmost clearness, invariably holding up to the mind's eye all the master's work, down to its smallest atoms, and such genial warmth that the innermost relations of every detail to the idea swaying the whole, are always firmly grasped and endued with life, her playing exercised yesterday an inspiring and ennobling influence. Such interpreters there must be as long as the most sublime works of our art are to exist uninjured. The less, in the rendering of them, the medium they require is perceptible, the more gratifying the result. Madlle Krebs is in a fair way to suppress all her own individuality, as far as such an artistic performance would draw it down into a more limited sphere of subjective significance. But she is, also, capable of sympathetically soaring inwardly to the solitary height whence Beethoven created and must be understood. Hence the exciting and ennobling effect she produces.

After what we have said, there is no need for us to give the reasons why the other things played by the Lady, including Reinecke's cadence in the Concerto, gratified us so much. The pieces selected were admirably adapted to the fair artist's nature, which is marked by something light and buoyant, seeking out technical difficulties with a sort of graceful wilfulness; and this nature of hers stood out, deeply significant, in the above pieces, more decidedly than before. She played a Barcarole (A minor) of Rubinstein's, and Schumann's "Traumeswirren" and "Toccata" (Op. 7). By the bye, we cannot refrain from here mentioning with what charming roguishness an octave-passage for the left hand in the last named piece, lightly and gracefully thrown in, peeped from amid all the far-sought difficulties of the composer.—Leipziger Tageblatt und Anzeiger.

Pesth.—The Abbate Franz Liszt has forwarded, for performance, to Herr Hans Richter, a new and original cantata, for barytone solo, chorus and orchestra. It is founded on a poem by Longfellow.—According to report, the Abbate and his Son-in-law will give some concerts next month for the benefit of the Baireuth enterprise.

Munich.—Herr Franz von Holstein's opera, Der Erbe von Morley, is a success at the Theatre Royal. The leading artists were exceedingly good, especially Madlle Louise Radecke, who sustains the character to which the author of the libretto has given the name of the well-known English actress, Miss Lydia Thompson.

Rome.—The season was to have commenced at the Teatro Apollo, on the 26th ult., with Les Huguenots, but the opening had to be deferred on account of the sudden indisposition of Signora Wisjak. The lady was sufficiently recovered to appear on the 28th, when both she and Sig. Nicolini were greatly applauded. So, also, was Sig. Aseglio, the conductor.

Social Intercourse.

(From "Another World.")

"The contact of society is necessary for the nurture and the preservation of the generous feelings implanted in us by the Great Spirit."

Among those who had lived in seclusion, seven out of the ten had lost their hair and the freshness of their complexion, both of which with us are highly valued. They were very sallow, and their figures betrayed the incipient decrepitude of old age, though for our world they were but in the prime of life, if not early manhood. Besides which they had formed contracted notions on many subjects, some of them being what is called eccentric.

On the other hand, the collected works of the ten men who had profited by contact with the world and its amusements were equal in all respects, and indeed superior in some to those of the "seclusionists." They were for the most part large and liberal-minded. There was but one who might be called narrow-minded and eccentric, but his exceptional state was greatly owing to the fact that the origin of this tendency had not been attended to in childhood. He had, indeed, been educated under the old system, and, consequently, before the establishment of the office of Character-divers. This man was the only one who was subject, though partially, to the physical accidents which had affected the "Seclusionists." The remaining nine "Society-sympathisers" remained fresh, vigorous, and gay.

What, however, satisfied my wise men the most was, that the works of the learned men who had lived in contact with the world were actually in many respects superior to the works of the "Seclusionists," although these also were more than remarkable.

In requiring learned men to mix with the world, I did not forbid frequent solitude and retirement for meditation. I only objected to the passion being indulged in to the exclusion of the refreshing sympathies developed by a contact with society.

The result of the experiment I have referred to seemed to satisfy even the ten "Seclusionists," who at least changed their habits in obedience to my law. The effects of the seclusion on some of the ten were, however, not got rid of, until a certain time had elapsed, and, but for increased knowledge of the malady of monomania, these effects on one of the ten "Seclusionists" would have been even far more serious than they fortunately proved to be.

THE MONOMANIAC.

This man, eminent in the highest degree, believed that another learned man, his friend and greatest admirer, was his bitter enemy. All efforts to convince him to the contrary were fruitless; for, although remarkably clear-sighted on most other subjects, he obstinately refused on this to listen to the truth. Indeed, the remonstrances of his friends had the effect of strengthening his conviction, that the reptile, as he called the supposed enemy, assumed the appearance of friendship, the better to mask his infamous designs.

This delusion went on for some time, but did not show itself beyond words, and even these were never addressed to the supposed enemy, whose designs he said "he would meet with simulation and the reptile's own insidious weapons." Greatly as all this was to be regretted, the man was so venerated, and was usually so calm, that none suspected any tendency to a deranged intellect. His strong feelings were ascribed to mistaken impressions, until a very disagreeable occurrence opened our eyes to his real state.

Hermes (Communicator).

AN INTERESTING LIST.

The modern operatic repertory, which has made the fortune of managers over the whole world, comprises a considerable number of works. The following catalogue contains the titles of some of them, with the date of their first production, and the name of the place where they were produced:—

IL BARBIERE DI SIVIGLIA, Rossini, Rome, 1816; OTELLO, Rossini, Naples, 1816; LA GAZZA LADRA, Rossini, Rome, 1817; DER FREISCHUTZ, Weber, Berlin, 1821; SEMIRAMIDE, Rossini, Venice, 1825; OBERON, Weber, London, 1826; MOSE, first at Paris, then at Naples, 1827; LA MUETTE DE PORTICI, Auber, Paris, 1828; LA STRANIERA, Bellini, Milan, 1828; GUILLAUME TELL, Rossini, Paris, 1829; LA VESTALE, Pacini, Placencia, 1830; ANNA BOLENA, Donizetti, Milan, 1831; LA SONNAMBULA, Bellini, Milan, 1831; NORMA, Bellini, Milan, 1831; CHIARA DI ROSEMBERG, Ricci, Milan, 1821; ROBERT LE DIABLE, Meyerbeer, Paris, 1831; BEATRICE DI TENDA, Bellini, Milan, 1832; L'ELISIR D'AMORE, Donizetti, Naples, 1832; TORQUATO TASSO, Donizetti, Rome, 1833; LUCREZIA BORGIA, Donizetti, Milan, 1833; IL NUOVO FIGARO, Ricci, Parma, 1833; GEMMA DI VERGY, Donizetti, Milan, 1834; I PURITANI, Bellini, Paris, 1834; UNA AVVENTURA DI SCARAMUCCIA, Ricci, Milan, 1834; ERA DUE ORE SONO TRE, Ricci, Turin, 1834; LA JUIVE, Halévy, Paris, 1835; MARINO FALIERO, Donizetti, Paris, 1835; LUCIA DI LAMMERMOOR, Donizetti, Naples, 1835; LES HUGUENOTS, Meyerbeer, Paris, 1836; CRISPINO E LA COMARE, The Brothers Ricci, Naples, 1837; BELISARIO, Donizetti, Venice, 1836; ROBERTO DEVEREUX, Donizetti, Naples, 1837; IL GIURAMENTO, Mercadante, Naples, 1838; MARIA DI RUDENS, Donizetti, Venice, 1838; I DUE ILLUSTRI RIVALI, Donizetti, Venice, 1839; POLIUTO, Donizetti, Turin, 1840; IL TEMPLARIO, Nicolai, Turin, 1840; LA FILLE DU RÉGIMENT, Donizetti, Paris, 1840; LA FAVORITA, Donizetti, Paris, 1840; LINDA DI CHAMOUNI, Donizetti, Vienna, 1844; NABUCCO, Verdi, Milan, 1842; SAFFO, Pacini, Milan, 1842; SAUL, Buzzi, Rome, 1843; I LOMBARDI, Verdi, Milan, 1843; DON PASQUALE, Donizetti, Paris, 1843; MARIA DI ROHAN, Donizetti, Vienna, 1843; DOM SEBASTIAN, Donizetti, Paris, 1843; ERNANI, Verdi, Venice, 1844; LA FIDANZATA CORSA, Pacini, Florence, 1844; I DUE FOSCARI, Verdi, Rome, 1844; STRADELLA, Flotow, Hamburgh, 1844; GIOVANNI D'ARCO, Verdi, Milan, 1845; ATILLA, Verdi, Venice, 1846; MACBETH, Verdi, Florence, 1847; MARTA, Flotow, Vienna, 1847; JONE, Petrella, Milan, 1848; LE PROPHÈTE, Meyerbeer, Paris, 1849; DON BUCEFALO, Cagnoni, Milan, 1849; TUTTI IN MASCHERA, Pedrotti, —; LUISA MILLER, Verdi, Naples, 1849; RIGOLETTO, Verdi, Venice, 1851; IL TROVATORE, Verdi, Rome, 1853; LA TRAVIATA, Verdi, Venice, 1853; L'ETOILE DU NORD, Meyerbeer, Paris, 1854; LES VEPRES SICILIENNES, Verdi, Paris, 1855; SIMON BOCCANEGRA, Verdi, Venice, 1856; UN BALLO IN MASCHERA, Verdi, Rome, 1859; FAUST, Gounod, Paris, 1859; LE PARDON DE PLOERMEL, Meyerbeer, Paris, 1859; LA FORZA DEL DESTINO, Verdi, St Petersburgh, 1863; L'AFRICAINE, Meyerbeer, Paris, 1865; DON CARLOS, Verdi, Paris, 1867; RUY BLAS, Marchetti, Milan, 1869; IL GUARANY, Gomez, Milan, 1870; AIDA, Verdi, Cairo, 1871; I PROMESSI SPOSI, Ponchielli, Milan, 1872; SALVATOR ROSA, Gomez, Genoa, 1873.

STETTIN.—Herr August Langert's grand romantic opera of Dornröschen has been very well received, and promises to become a stock-piece here. Neither trouble nor expense has been spared in its production, while the conductor, Herr Faltis, and the principal artists, Mdlles Lenau, Schrötter, Teubner, Herren Nöldechen and Cabisius, contribute their full quota to the success achieved.

DARMSTADT.—Sig. Verdi's Aida brought, on the first night of its production here, with the prices of admission raised, 1,300 florins to the treasury of the Court Theatre. As the mise-en-scène cost about 12,000 thalers, some nine equally lucrative performances will be needed before the management can recoup itself for the bare outlay on dresses, scenery, etc., to say nothing of the composer's rights.

COLOGNE.—Herr Franz Diener, at present singing in Nuremberg, has been engaged by Herr Ernst for the next season of eight months at the Stadttheater here. He is to receive the respectable sum of 12,000 thalers. A short time ago, before he, or any one else, suspected he possessed a voice, Herr Diener played the tenor violin in the orchestra of a Berlin Theatre, and, probably, did not gain in a year what he now makes in a week.

HANOVER.—After being performed, between 1840 and 1850 at Leipsic and Weimar, and more recently at Munich, Weimar, and Wiesbaden, Robert Schumann's opera, Genoveva, has just been produced here under the direction of Herr Fischer. The principal parts were well sustained by Mesdles Wekerlin, Riegler, Herren Stägemann and W. Müller, but it was felt that, despite the beauty of the music, the wretched libretto will always prevent the opera from becoming popular upon the lyric stage.

GRÉTRY AND HIS *GUILLAUME TELL.

Few persons beyond those in musical circles know that, before Rossini's masterpiece, William Tell had already furnished in France the subject of a lyrical work. On the 9th April, 1791, a three-act comic opera, Guillaume Tell, words by Sedaine, and music by Grétry, was performed for the first time at the Comédie Italienne. It appears to have achieved only a moderate success, despite the reputation and talent of the two authors, whose sober genius, by the way, was, it would seem, not particularly adapted for a work of this description.

A small annual publication, Les Spectacles de Paris, for 1792, gives the following account of it: "A great deal of skill in the management of the subject, and of dramatic intelligence. Music full" (of what?) "and of lofty character. But the epoch of a great revolution, which belongs to tragedy, will never make a proper subject for a comic opera, and the little success of Guillaume Tell is a proof of this."

Another publication of the same kind, L'Almanach général des Spectacles, speaks thus of it: "This piece does honour neither to the genius nor the principles of M. Sedaine. But he followed the impulse of the moment, and, if he is to be condemned for this, he is in such numerous company that it is impossible to be angry with him. If the aristocracy were the dominant party, M. Sedaine would be an aristocrat; of this there can be no doubt. In the music we again meet with the creative talent of M. Grétry. No composer has more esprit, and knows the magic of the stage better than he. In saying this, we are repeating a truth which has been told over and over again for the last twenty years."

To refer to a musician's esprit with respect to a piece based upon such a subject is undoubtedly tantamount to awarding that musician only faint praise. Another fact, too, which proves that the success of Guillaume Tell was, at best, only moderate, is that we do not find the work among those of which Grétry has given us an analysis in his singular Mémoires ou Essais sur la Musique, which, as some one so justly said, should have been entitled: Essais sur ma Musique.

Yet, strange to say, Guillaume Tell was the first of Grétry's works which was the object of an arrangement like that afterwards adopted for Zémire et Azor, Richard Cœur de Lion, and L'Epreuve Villageoise. On the 24th May, 1828, it was revived at the Opéra-Comique, the book having been touched up by Pelissier, and the music scored afresh by Berton. Thus remodelled, it was very well received, the final chorus of the second act exciting, we are told, enthusiasm. On the first night of the revival, a sort of ceremony was got up in honour of Grétry, whose bust was brought upon the stage, and crowned by the artists, amid the loud applause of all the house.*

Grétry, however, in two or three passages of his Essais sur la Musique, speaks incidentally of his Guillaume Tell, his object in doing so being to bring out in especial relief the rustic character which he wished to give to his score. "In Guillaume Tell," he says, "it was necessary that the revolutionary energy should be felt, but, through this terrible feeling, certain rustic traits, indicating the candour of the inhabitants of Switzerland, are everywhere heard; they seem to say: 'It is to preserve our virtues that we rise in insurrection.'" Elsewhere he remarks: "I was at Lyons when I wrote the music of Guillaume Tell. I requested the colonel of a Swiss regiment, quartered in the town, to ask me to dinner with his officers. At the dessert, I told these gentlemen that, having to set to music the poem of William Tell, their compatriot of former days, I should feel obliged if they would sing the most characteristic airs of the period, especially the Swiss mountain airs. I heard several such compositions, and, without my copying, as far as I know, anything from them, my brain was doubtless worked up to the proper pitch, for the Swiss, and musicians generally, like the mountainous tone which reigns in this musical production."

ARTHUR POUGIN.

* From the Guide Musical.

* It was the epoch of revolutionary pieces. Carafa's Masaniello had already been heard, on the 27th December, 1827, at the same Théâtre Feydeau; five months afterwards, 24th May, 1828, Grétry's Guillaume Tell was taken there. The Opera, too, had given, on the 29th February, 1828, one of its greatest successes, La Muette de Portici, and was preparing another, destined to be no less brilliant, Rossini's Guillaume Tell, produced on the 23rd August, 1829. A year later, the Revolution of July was to justify in some sort the political apprehensions manifested by the Gazette de France when the joint work of Grétry and Sedaine was revived. It is a curious specimen of legitimist criticism in 1828, as the reader may perceive by the following extracts:—

"This piece will always be a dangerous stupidity . . . It is the picture of a people revolting . . . on whatever pretext it may be . . . These things tend to ruin the royal power and the authority of the Government. . . . Why this resurrection of such a ridiculous and politically inopportune bit of old rubbish?

"The piece is stupid, and filled more especially with those peculiar samples of stupidity which Sedaine was so capable of writing. Though we are for the future to be deprived of the two charming lines:

"Que béni soit votre hymen,
Et que le ciel dise Amen,

"we have a great many of the following calibre:

"A cinquante pas précis,
Il faut abattre une pomme
Sur la tête de ton fils.

"But it was for the music that the friends and claqueurs had been told to be enthusiastic. M Berton, who seems every day to be doing all he can for the purpose of forgetting that he is the author of Montano and of Aline, undertook to arrange Grétry's antiquated music, while M. Pelissier undertook the same for Sedaine's words. M. Berton has put himself, we know not why, at the head of the detractors of Rossini; he will not allow the composer of Semiramide and Il Barbiere to be a man of genius; he is angry at the predilection manifested by the public during the last ten years for Otello and La Gazza, and he fancies that, by celebrating in an exaggerated manner the genius and the works of Grétry, he will eclipse or weaken the admiration felt for the author of Mosè and La Cenerentola. How pitiful! Such, however, is the hobby of M. Berton, who can with difficulty forgive Boieldieu for La Dame Blanche and the vogue enjoyed by that charming work, while the music of his own Pharamond which, with ironical modesty, he called his Petite Dame Blanche, met with no success. M. Berton probably imagined that he must deal a hard blow with Grétry's exhumed production, to which he has added the overture of Elisca, and the duet of the two soldiers from Aucassin et Nicolette, by the same author. Orders were therefore given to applaud tumultuously this score, which, as Grétry's niece said, 'ne sent pas le serpolet,' but which contains great beauties, especially in the duet I have mentioned, and the magnificent finale of the second act. It was the more applauded out of opposition to Italian opera, because it was known that Rossini is at present engaged on a Guillaume Tell for the Grand Opera. Such is the secret of the somewhat too pyramidal success just obtained for Grétry, whose bust the audience demanded at the end of the piece. The performers, supposed not to expect such a request, soon re-appeared, grouped with a vast amount of art and laurels round the effigy of the great man, who will always be worthy of our admiration, despite the bad voices and wretched acting of the artists, and M. Berton's enthusiasm."

Leclerc played Gessler; Huet, Guillaume Tell; Vatère, Melchthal; Madlle Feuillade, Melchthal's Son, Marie's lover; Vizentini, Pfeiffer, the goatherd; Henri and Behic, the two soldiers; Mad. Boulanger, Edwige; Mad. Rigaut, Marie; and little Charlotte Bordes, Tell's Son.

Under the title of Théâtre moderne, Cours de litterature dramatique, Paris, Allardin, 1836, 2 vols, octavo, the author, M. Delaforest published in a collective form his feuilletons from La Gazette de France. (Note of the Guide Musical.)

'IN MEMORIAM."

TRANSLATION.

"Alas, for us your lyre is hushed; Heaven's denizens were anxious to hear such strains as yours from your own lips."

No more for us thou tun'st the lyre;
Alas for earth! 'Twas Heaven's desire
To add thy voice to seraph choir.

BAKALOUM.

FREELY TRANSLATED.

"Alas! to us the lute strings are silent! the angels of Heaven desired to hear such songs from thy lips."

Silent have become thy lute strings,
Never more, alas! thou'lt write;
Angels list, with holy rapture,
To the songs thou'lt now indite.

THE APPLICATION OF WIND TO STRING INSTRUMENTS.

The third meeting of the Musical Association was held on Monday evening in the Beethoven Rooms. Sir Julius Benedict was present for the first time, and among other distinguished musicians in the room were Sir John Goss, Messrs Turle, John Hullah, Ebenezer Prout, W. H. Monk, C. E. Stephens, the Rev. J. Troutbeck, minor canon of Westminster Abbey; the Rev. Thomas Elmore, the Earl of Wilton (who has just joined the association), Mr Ellis, F.R.S., Mr Sedley Taylor, M.A., the Hon. Mrs Newdigate, and a numerous company of ladies. Mr J. Baillie Hamilton, of University College, Oxford, had undertaken to read a paper on "The Application of Wind to String Instruments," and, before attacking his subject, he gave an account of the circumstances which had led him to devote his attentions to it. At Harrow Mr Hamilton had studied the matter with Mr John Farmer, the organist and music master of the school, and, after going to Oxford, he determined to pursue his investigations, but found that they involved such intense application and the devotion of so much time to surmount even the mechanical difficulties in the way, that he had since given up his University career in order to carry out his experiments. Mr Hamilton then proceeded to sketch the history of the various efforts made to apply wind to strings, beginning with the old Æolian harp, in which the vibration of the string is made by a natural draught of wind.

All the subsequent attempts in the same field were but efforts to reduce that beautiful but fitful source of sound to human control. The primary necessity was to make the whole string sound, and to do this it was needful to increase the draught of air and to concentrate it on the string. Insidore and Jullien made several instruments in which the difficulties were partly overcome, but the first wind fiddle he had read of was one made in Central Africa by the bushmen, who, however, had failed, like the European inventors, in the concentration of the wind on the string. Mr Hamilton then described the various elementary stages of his investigations, the result of which he showed by producing a sound from a string divided into three parts, to the centre of which a reed was applied, the fundamental note being thus reinforced. A diapason pipe was also sounded to the same note. Mr Hamilton next defined the respective advantages of wind and string. The string, he asserted, has (1) a simple mode of reinforcement; (2) economy of space to produce a given note; (3) the blending of harmonies upon the common sound-board; and (4) sympathy. The wind, or, in a word, the sound of the organ-pipe, has, he argued, the advantages of (1) special reinforcement by a column of air; (2) volume of tone; (3) variety and quality; and (4) sustained sound. In his new instrument he claimed to have rendered the moving and sympathetic power of the string co-existent with the intensity of the organ-pipe, thus producing a new and fine effect. He then gave illustrations by sounding notes, giving the reed and string tone together, the first of which produced an effect which might be described as that of a string horn; the second gave the peculiarly beautiful effect of the Æolian harp; and the third the note of the trumpet without the peculiar rending sound which it is so difficult to avoid in that instrument. But when he had got thus far, Mr Hamilton said, he was met by the question, How would it be possible to keep a string organ in tune, the proverbial tendency of strings to get out of tune being regarded by many persons as an almost insuperable obstacle? He had, however, introduced an elastic string which would not get out of tune.

Mr Hamilton then proceeded to reply to a series of questions put to him by the Earl of Wilton, Mr Hullah, and other gentlemen, and he mentioned incidentally, in reply to a query as to the variety of effects which could be produced on a string organ answering to those of the stops in an ordinary organ, that he could at present reckon on giving at least thirty stops. Mr Hamilton explained that he had been unable to bring with him his complete apparatus, owing to his inability to obtain the use of the room to fit it up, and thus he had only been able to illustrate his remarks by single sounds, but he hoped to give more complete illustrations on a future day.

VENICE.—Il Guarany has been produced with tolerable success at the Fenice.

MEYERBEER AT SPA.*

I heard the following unpublished anecdote from M. Tombeur, director of the Communal School, and these few words must serve as preface.

The illustrious composer, at the time to which I refer, resided at the sign of the Prophet, near Poulon. It was a splendid morning in July. He took his umbrella, and bestrode the ass that Bourdoux, now dead, had brought round. Off he went, no one knew whither. He preferred, however, the difficult shady paths of the promenade which at present bears his name. The cadence-like and almost rhythmical language of the rivulet over the pebbles; the tiny outbursts of rage of the little cascades gushing from between the erratic blocks of stone scattered here and there in the narrow thread of water; the majestic murmuring of the trees in the calm air, the capricious songs of the little sparrows of our woods, were all sounds which produced for his ear harmony, whence he derived the motives of the grand compositions which have rendered him celebrated. His excursions, repeated every day in our shady woods, are a protest against the methodical purists, who will see nothing in the language of nature on her good days save noises scarcely worthy to be observed by the dreamers whom they call poets.

On the day in question, however, nothing was seen at Spa of Meyerbeer, of the umbrella, or of the donkey. Now Meyerbeer, the umbrella, and the donkey used pretty often to come and take a turn round the kiosk in the Allée des Sept-Heures during the afternoon concert. The maestro's long legs, reaching nearly to the ground, dangled from the flanks of the animal, who plodded on very regularly, while the umbrella beat time, like a conductor's stick. It was highly comic, but the spectators did not laugh. It sufficed for them to know that the rider going round about them owned a name which would become immortal. Not to see Meyerbeer of an afternoon or an evening under the shade of the great trees was to lose one's day. On the day in question, he was not seen at the Prophet; they were expecting him ever since mid-day. It struck five, his dinner-hour. No Meyerbeer. Then came the evening; still no Meyerbeer. People began to grow anxious. It had happened on several occasions, in the time when the composer used to ride on horseback, that his steed had thrown him in the dust. This was when he began beating, on the poor beast's flanks, the measure of the musical phrases produced by his always busy brain. It is true that donkeys are more patient than horses, but they are, also, more obstinate, and, with such a rider it was not certain that the new Aliboron's patience would successfully withstand his pig-headedness. At last, the composer returned. It was ten o'clock at night. He had been absent fourteen hours. He was as pale and ghastly as a corpse in a winding sheet. Even the donkey seemed to share the sufferings of his master. The latter flung himself into an armchair. "Quick! fetch a doctor!" he articulated, "I am dying!"—In less than two minutes, the doctor was there. He felt the patient's pulse and looked at his tongue. "You feel ill, don't you?" said the man of art.—"Very ill!" was the reply.—"Is it long since you had anything to eat?"—"I am not hungry. I have taken nothing since yesterday evening, I think."—The Æsculapius began laughing. "This is my prescription, Sir. Two boiled eggs, half a common roll and a glass of wine. At midnight you will dine. Had you your donkey with you?"—"Yes. He has had nothing either."—"Let him be looked after, if you please."

At two o'clock in the morning, the maestro had recovered from his mortal illness. It was thus that, one day, he was nearly dying because he was an artist. It is true that Newton, as tradition assures us, boiled his watch instead of the egg which had been brought him. The next day, Meyerbeer, the donkey, and the umbrella, came once more, at three o'clock in the afternoon, and took a turn for five minutes round the kiosk in the Allée des Sept-Heures.

CH. HENRI.

STUTTGART.—Herr Sontheim, whose voice has suffered something from the inroads made on it by the Music of the Future, appeared lately as the jack-booted hero in Adam's Postillon de Longjumeau. He was much applauded by an audience which filled every nook and corner of the Theatre Royal.

WAIFS.

Liszt will not go to America on any terms. He has heard of the piano-makers.

Mr Arthur Sullivan has been spending a portion of his holidays at the seat of the Earl of Shrewsbury.

Herr Carl Formes has several scrap-books containing newspaper articles, and now he can add to the collection another volume filled with touching obituaries of himself.

A party of eight young men went out serenading a few nights since. They sat on the pavement, which had recently been paved with a tar solution. Next morning, the rear of six pairs of pants dotted the walk, and music is heard no more around that cottage.

M. Ambroise Thomas has had put on his door a bell which gives the new la. Rossini had a similar bell. When pulled too abruptly it would give a false note. Rossini thereupon invariably exclaimed: "I bet it is that dog Ronconi, who never once in all his life gave a note accurately."

An American male soprano, Mr Heywood, has been playing at the Berlin Walhalla, Leonora, in the Trovatore, and La Grand Duchesse de Gerolstein. He sings the two parts seriously, not as a burlesque, and his voice is stated by the German critics to be that of a pure and sympathetic soprano.

Before Albani's arrival, Manager Max Strakosch tried to make the opera successful on the strength of a fairly good ensemble. He found his own purse suffered in consequence. Since Mdlle Albani has been singing, the tide of fortune has turned, and he has now every prospect of a remunerative season. The "one woman power" is still paramount.

Mendelssohn's father has been heard to say that in his intercourse with the world he was constantly reminded of his own comparative unimportance by allusions to his being the son of one great man, and the father of another. For a private individual such a position might be somewhat unsatisfactory; but how much more it must be to one before the public may be gathered from the fact of Mdlle Carlotta Patti refusing to sing at a recent concert in Birmingham because she had been announced as "the sister of Adelina Patti." Looking at this matter only from a commercial point of view, we cannot acquit Messrs Harrison (who were, we believe, responsible for the advertisement) of all blame; for if the vocalist were a mere pretender, they would have no right to force her upon the Birmingham public because she was the "sister of Adelina Patti;" and, if her fame had been already firmly established, there could be no occasion for any such adventitious aid. Artistically, there can be but one opinion upon her conduct under the circumstances; and we heartily congratulate Mdlle Patti upon resolutely maintaining the dignity of a profession, the refined and elevating tendency of which is too apt occasionally to be forgotten.—Musical Times.

Clara Louise Kellogg is credited with these remarks concerning foreign music teachers: "They give their pupils no rest. It is to the interest of the teacher to do so; for, when a new comet rushes forth, the question is, 'Who was her master?' It is the best card in the world for him, and he knows it, and puts in his best. When Grisi first appeared, the question ran through Europe, 'Who taught her?' and the teacher was run down with pupils. True, he never produced another Grisi, but he has brought out a good many voices. Then there was Wartel, who gave us Nilsson; but that was his greatest feat. He has done nothing since, for there are but few who can withstand his exacting method. He would break an American girl down in no time. Why? Because our American damsels don't have the physique, and will dissipate. It is nothing in the world but an absolute waste of money for young American girls to go to Europe. They have completely demoralized those foreign teachers, as Americans have demoralized Europe. There are the Milan masters; they do the biggest business now swindling American girls. They tell them lies about their voices, and coddle them up with great ideas as to their future—and all just to get their money out of them. Why these girls have only to hint that they come from America, and they are taken in most wofully. I tell you, sir, it is a down-right shame."—"And do you really think they can be educated here?"—"Most unquestionably. They have only to practise self-denial, and study incessantly and hard, and the day will not be far distant when the voice of the foreign opera-singer would no longer be heard in this land. Do you know, I am fairly disgusted with our people for running after foreign singers, as they do, instead of trying to bring out our home talent. Naturally, American girls have the sweetest voices in the world. No country on the earth produces finer natural voices; and if the people of this vast and glorious republic would only encourage our girls to perfect their musical education, and the girls would only give up their folly, and cultivate their bodies and taste, we would soon have as fine opera as the foreigners produce."—Dwight. [Bunkum.—Ed.]

Après l'adieu triomphal de la Nilsson, ce sera dans quelques jours la triomphale rentrée de la Patti. Aux dernières représentations de Mdlle Krauss la tragédienne lyrique succéderont bientôt les débuts de Mdlle Marimon, une virtuose di primo cartello dans le genre brillant.—Cette saison constitue donc aussi un bon début pour l'impresario Pollini.

The New York Clipper relates this: "A touching incident we witnessed the other evening, while attending a minstrel entertainment. A young and pretty Irish lass—and, judging by her fresh and ruddy complexion, not very long absent from her own green isle—entered the auditorium, and, before taking her seat, dropped on her knees in the aisle, made the sign of the cross, slowly rose, and then went to the chair her coupon called for. We subsequently learned that she is an exemplary member of the Catholic Church, and this was her first appearance at a public place of amusement, and the force of habit induced the observance of a custom peculiar to the Church."

Strassburgh.—Herr R. Wagner's Lohengrin has been most successfully produced at the Stadttheater.

Genoa.—La Forza del Destino was the Christmas attraction at the Teatro Carlo Felice. It went off very well.

Mantua.—Aida, with Signore Scarati, Proch, Signori Bresciani, Nollet, and Seidemann, has proved a great hit here.

St Louis (U.S.).—Madlle Ilma de Murska has paid this city a visit, and sung at three concerts. She was enthusiastically received.

Stockholm.—A new national Swedish opera, The Mountain-King's Bride, words by M. Heyberg, music by M. Hallström, has proved a brilliant success.

Leipsic.—Herr Richard Wagner has been here enlisting recruits, vocal and instrumental, for the coming National-Festival-Stage-Play-Performances at Baireuth.

Vienna.—In a letter to a high personage, Herr R. Wagner has expressed his willingness to allow his Tristan und Isolde to be produced at the Imperial Operahouse.

Turin.—Aida, with Signora Singer, Signori Patierno and Moriami, has proved a great success at the Teatro Regio. The principal artists and Sig. Pedrotti, the conductor, were called on several times.

Chemnitz.—The members of the Singacademie lately gave a successful performance of Herr Carl Reinthaler's oratorio: Jephta und seine Tochter. The vocal solos were taken by Mesdlle Gutschbach, Mad. Steinhauser, Herren Pielke, and Lissmann. The harp solos were performed by Herr Wenzel of Leipsic. Herr Schneider acted as conductor.

London: Duncan Davison & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

"The remarkable qualities of this book are the author's freedom from conventional trammels, the strong sense of his opinions, and the novelty yet evident soundness of his precepts; his work has consequently come into general use as a manual of vocal instruction."—Daily News.

DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE,

For invigorating and enriching the voice, and removing affections of the throat.

DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE is universally acknowledged to be the most valuable remedy for sore throat, hoarseness and relaxed throat. It should always be taken before singing or reciting, as it strengthens the vocal organs. It is most extensively prescribed by the faculty for the throat and voice. Dr Lewis of Basingstoke says he finds them most efficacious, and in Dr Copland's Dictionary of Practical Medicine (Longman & Co.), they are strongly recommended at pages 872 and 1492. They are used by all the greatest vocalists and orators in Europe, and have been established over a quarter of a century. Testimonials from Patti, Grisi, Lablache, Santley, &c. Sold in boxes, 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. by all Chemists throughout the United Kingdom and the Colonies.

The Poetry by JESSICA RANKIN.

The Music by M. W. BALFE.

Sung with great success by Mr EDWARD LLOYD at Mr Kuhe's Concert at Brighton.

Price 4s.

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

"Mr Edward Lloyd gave the audience an unexpected degree of pleasure by his very admirable interpretation of Schubert's lovely 'Serenade,' and made scarcely less impression by his elegant delivery of Balfe's truly beautiful melody, set to words by Jessica Rankin, 'She stood in the sunshine,' an air that may compare favourably with the very best of this master's inspirations."—Brighton Guardian.

"HER I LOVE."

BALLAD.

By WILFORD MORGAN.

Price 4s.

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

"This composition is, in all respects, worthy of its predecessor, 'My sweetheart when a boy.' It is simple in structure, and within the means of every amateur; but its music is pleasing, and thoroughly appropriate to the words. No doubt the song will soon win a share of public favour."—Musical World.

"Mr Wilford Morgan's song, 'Her I love,' will be certain to find many admirers for the musicianly instinct which pervades it, as well as for the happy manner in which the very pretty melody has been laid out for the voice."—Morning Post.

"LITTLE BIRDIE, SING TO ME."

SONG.

Words by Miss S. P. HOWELL.

Music by WILFORD MORGAN,

Price 4s.

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street.

"A naïve little song for a young girl is 'Little birdie, sing to me,' composed by Wilford Morgan. There is a melodious ring in this song that will please the ear."—Graphic.

"Mr Wilford Morgan's latest production, 'Little birdie, sing to me,' apparently aims at simplicity of melody and accompaniment, and has happily hit it."—Morning Post.

"'LITTLE BIRDIE, SING TO ME'—Mr Wilford Morgan has just published another very pleasing song under the above title. It is a very fresh, bright melody, which might almost be signed Mendelssohn; and the accompaniment, while sufficient to sustain the voice, is extremely easy."—Era.

"A charming song, full of melody and sweetness, without being difficult to singers of moderate compass."—Hornet.

"From Messrs Duncan Davison & Co. we have a song by the well-known vocalist, Mr Wilford Morgan, 'Little birdie, sing to me,' a remarkably good and characteristic setting of some pretty, simple words."—Echo.

"A tuneful and pleasing ballad for a voice of average compass, effectively harmonised, although the pianoforte accompaniment presents but very few difficulties to the performer. 'Little birdie' contains all the elements of popularity, and should eventually become as popular as the composer's 'My sweetheart when a boy.'"—Sunday Times.

OPENING OF THE NEW OPERA IN PARIS.

(From the "Graphic," Jan. 9.)

The musical part of the ceremony by which the new Grand Opera was inaugurated on Tuesday night cannot fairly be regarded otherwise than in the light of an experiment. In fact, it was neither more nor less than a dress rehearsal, before one of the most brilliant audiences ever assembled in a theatre. A general feeling prevailed that the opening of so magnificent a building, in presence of so distinguished a company, might have been celebrated by a programme and performance each more worthy the occasion. But unexpected drawbacks compelled the director, M. Halanzier, at the eleventh hour, to make changes which materially lessened the attraction of the selection as originally contemplated. The sudden indisposition of Mdme Christine Nilsson, vouched for by the published certificate of her medical adviser, necessitated a withdrawal of the two acts from Hamlet, and the one act from Faust; so that neither M. Thomas nor M. Gounod, the two most highly esteemed of living French dramatic composers, were represented. This contretemps was the more disheartening, inasmuch as Mdme Nilsson had, at considerable personal sacrifice, come all the way from Russia, with the express purpose of taking her share in the performance. Her loss entailed the further loss of another great and popular artist. M. Faure was to play Hamlet and Mephistopheles, and the disappointment at his non-forthcoming may be easily imagined. Yet there was no alternative; the operas of MM. Thomas and Gounod being withdrawn, nothing remained for M. Faure to do. The programme, as revised, stood thus:—Overture to La Muette de Portici, Auber (poor Auber!); acts 1 and 2 of La Juive, Halévy; Overture to Guillaume Tell, Rossini; scene from Les Huguenots, Meyerbeer; second tableau from La Source (ballet). Thus the absence of the two living French musicians was atoned for by the presence of one French musician, one Italian, and one German—all belonging to the past. It must be admitted that to give merely an overture by Auber, an overture by Rossini, and the fragment of a scene by Meyerbeer—for only the "Benediction des Poignards" was admitted, all the superb preliminary being passed over—was a sorry compliment at the best to three men so justly renowned. It cannot be said too often that Auber is the greatest and most thoroughly "national" of all French composers for the stage; while what the authors of Guillaume Tell and the Huguenots have done by assimilating the Italian and German schools with French dramatic music is notorious. The Parisians, as a matter of course, must have dancing, in some form, at all their operatic performances — opera without ballet, to them, leaving a universal want unfulfilled. Even the dogmatic and unbending Wagner was compelled, much against his wish, to add ballet music to Tannhäuser, when that remarkable work was produced, years since, at the old house in the Rue Lepelletier. The selection from the "ballet-pantomime" of MM. Nuitter, St Léon, Minkous, and Delibes, was therefore easily explained, the last act of Hamlet, which is also diversified by ballet, having been omitted.

The general effect of the music, the orchestral part of it more especially, raised frequent doubts as to the "sonority" of the auditorium. The overture to Masaniello (La Muette), heard from the orchestral stalls, that to Guillaume Tell, from the amphitheatre, and the "Benediction des Poignards," from the second tier of boxes, were equally unsatisfactory. The orchestra is said to comprise 100 players; but the effect was by no means what might have been hoped from such a phalanx of practised instrumentalists. The chorus is also believed to consist of 100 singers; nevertheless, the result was anything but commensurate with reasonable expectation. That the orchestra should be raised still nearer to the level of the stage is the opinion of almost every amateur. In sonority, under the actual circumstances, it cannot compare with our London orchestras; but there is no knowing what may be ultimately contrived with remedies suggested by increased experience. Just at present, however, it is useless denying that the acoustical properties of the new house are decidedly inferior to those of the old; and for this all the sumptuous—indeed, in certain respects, superfluously sumptuous—arrangements outside that part of the edifice devoted to the musical performances can never make up. The foyer, or saloon, to which a large number of the audience resort, whenever the curtain falls, was on Tuesday night a spectacle astonishing for its splendour and variety. Nevertheless, it will be borne in mind what kind of assembly graced the occasion. The diamonds and other precious jewels alone, which adorned the costumes of the many distinguished personages taking voluntary part in the exhibition, might have helped to pay off a good instalment of the late war indemnity. On the other hand, all the glittering splendour on nights of ordinary representations, before ordinary houses, would seem, to many, more or less out of keeping.

The most satisfying performance of the evening, from every point of view, was that of La Juive, of which, as has already been hinted, the first and second acts were given. La Juive is certainly not the liveliest of French serious operas; on the contrary, it is one of the most prolix and dreary—full of climaxes and anticlimaxes, with scarcely a single piece of continuous music from beginning to end. At the same time, one cannot ignore the fact that the French have long accepted it as one of their lyrico-dramatic chef d'œuvres; and as we must do at Rome as do the Romans, so at Paris we are in duty bound to look at La Juive through Parisian spectacles. There has been no Rachel equal to Falcon, and no Eléazar (Mario excepted) equal to Nourrit, since what is regarded as Halévy's greatest opera was originally brought out (1835—a year before the Huguenots). A certain mot of Cherubini's on that occasion will never be forgotten. Halévy was Cherubini's favourite pupil; and, after the second or third act of La Juive had been received with great applause, went to his master's box. "Maître," said Halévy, "vous ne me dites rien!" "Puisque tu ne m'as rien dit," was the retort of the stern Florentine. The verdict of the public, however, was pronounced in a wholly different sense. La Juive remains a "classic" with its author's compatriots (how far influenced by the admirable libretto of Scribe, originally intended for Rossini, is left to conjecture) up to the present time; and thus it was chosen to play the leading part in an entertainment which Paris has been eagerly expecting for years. The principal characters were thus distributed:—Rachel, Mdme Krauss; Eudoxie, Mdlle Belval (daughter of the well-known bass of that name); Eléazar, M. Villaret; Leopold, M. Bosquin; Brogni, M. Belval, &c. Mdme Krauss, a lyric tragedian of the school of Mdlle Tietjens, though by no means to be placed in the same rank as that admirable and versatile artist, who is comedian as well as tragedian, possesses unquestionable ability, and is a great and deserved favourite with the Parisians. She and M. Villaret (the Jewess and the Jew) were loudly applauded, and called before the curtain, when once the audience, absorbed with other matters, and using their opera-glasses rather than their ears, had leisure to attend to the performance, to which, let it be recorded, the Lord Mayor of London, noted for his artistic proclivities, paid a strict and undisturbed attention, which to the artists on the stage must have been gratifying.

The performance did not terminate till half an hour after midnight, the President of the Republic, the Lord Mayor, and most of the distinguished company remaining until the end. Inside the theatre there were no public demonstrations of any kind; but outside, both when coming and departing, the Lord Mayor ("Sir Stowe," as the Paris Figaro facetiously styles him) was welcomed by the immense crowd with repeated acclamations.

EXETER HALL.

Exeter Hall was recently the scene of an interesting ceremony in connection with the Sol-fa movement. The members and supporters of the Association met in front of the great Orchestral platform, and presented to their founder, the Rev. John Curwen, a purse containing a cheque for a large amount, and to Mrs Curwen an admirably painted portrait of her husband. The success of the Tonic Sol-fa system is now so great that it may seem to some unjust to disparage it, but the objections to it are so well grounded that they ought not to be ignored. The system aims at nothing less than a complete alteration of our present vocal notation, a change from what Mr Curwen may call a complex to a more simple expression of musical phrases. When the Tonic Sol-fa notation is proved to be easier of acquirement than that universally used, Mr Curwen has nothing to fear, from what he calls professional prejudices, but as yet he has only proved that the result of his teaching is highly satisfactory, and that earnestness of purpose can overcome great difficulties. The system has yet to be tried upon its merits apart from the extraordinary zeal which at present accompanies its teaching. When shown to be an improvement on the present mode of notating sounds for vocalists, it must also be shown to be suitable for instrumentalists, and be applied to instrumental works, or two kinds of notation must be studied by those aiming to become both vocal and instrumental performers. Let Mr Curwen prove the usefulness of the Tonic Sol-fa system to the musical requirements of the day, and he may reckon his followers by millions, and command the suffrages of musicians as well as amateur vocalists.—The Hour, Jan. 4.

ARABELLA GODDARD'S FAREWELL TO MELBOURNE.

(From the "Melbourne Argus" of October 24, 1874.)

Madame Goddard has bidden farewell to Melbourne, and those who, during her stay here, have been privileged to hear her, will always carry with them the satisfactory reflection that, in the highest school of composition for the most popular of instruments, they possess a standard which shall guide their judgment to just conclusions, whenever the question of artistic performance shall arise. The great pianist, whose final appearance in this part of the world we now note, has always played in this city to a mixed audience, and, without any question at all, it is well that she has done so. By this means the fanatic, who believed he could hear no beauty in anything beneath the form of the sonata, has been constrained to acknowledge the elegant thought and skilful treatment which produced many a pièce de concert; while the numerous unlettered, who own the charm of well-remembered tune, have not only enjoyed full gratification of their simpler tastes, but have had their minds expanded by the higher examples of the beautiful in music which she has been the means of showing them, even while they waited for that which they thought they liked best. The judgment in matters of taste may not be formed without the aid of comparisons; and these indispensable aids to culture in musical art Madame Goddard has afforded in abundance during her stay amongst us—a period which for our sakes is all too short, but one, let us hope, which has been attended with solid advantage to the great artist who has now left us, most likely for ever. The whole musical public here has been benefited by her visit thus far, that the ear which sought its highest enjoyment in the skilful repetition of the strains of "The last rose of summer," "Auld Robin Gray," or "Home, sweet home," is now cognisant of the charm there is in the "Choral Fantasia," and "The Concerto in D minor," and is to this extent improved and aggrandized by recollections which will last a life-time.

Other opportunities may serve wherein to speak about the influence of the great player who has now left us. The performance of last night calls for present notice. Be it said, to the great satisfaction of all who have the reputation of the city at heart, as a place with some claims to culture, that the Operahouse was filled at every level, from floor to ceiling, with an intelligent and admiring auditory. The great performance of the evening was Mendelssohn's Concerto in D minor, for pianoforte and orchestra, Op. 40, Madame Goddard at the pianoforte, and the band of the Operahouse, under the direction of Mr John Hill. The work is too large to notice in detail at such time as we write. It consists of three movements—1, allegro appassionato; 2, molto adagio; and 3, a splendid finale, presto scherzando. The solo player's share of the work was perfect. She played on her own piano, and, in the Operahouse, the effect was brought nearer to the listener than in the Town Hall. In the adagio movement all that could be done by the composer to give sweetness, fulness, and rich colour to the theme by means of handfuls of chords, bearing in the midst of them the unmistakable melody—was illustrated by the player with rare grace and mastery. In the finale the subject was given out with such crisp and spontaneous rapidity, that the fingers seemed to think for themselves, as if they had learned the piece and were playing it independently of sight or any other faculty. In this fine performance, which has not been excelled by anything which Madame Goddard has played here, she was assisted most ably by the orchestral accompaniment. Each player has his individual share of credit in producing this result; but to the admirable conducting of Mr John Hill belongs the chief merit of having led them, restrained them, and generally controlled to the highly successful issue we note. After this, Madame Goddard played the "Prayer," from Mosè in Egitto, a duet by Thalberg and De Beriot, a fantasia on Les Huguenots with Mr Hill, violinist; and a Welsh fantasia by De Sivrai. Recalled on each occasion with every mark of favour, Madame Goddard could not resist the appeal for an encore at the last, and played in her own eloquent way, "Home, sweet home," a significant adieu, which told deeply with all who heard it. Let her journey prosper for the good of the art she adorns.

Herr Wilhelm Doehler, who is engaged to travel with Mdme Goddard, played a violin fantasia, by Haumann, from Masaniello, and this being encored, he gave Rode's Air with variations. He also played in the second part of the concert a fantasia by Alard, from Anna Bolena. He was very favourably received by the audience, and the good opinion which we expressed of him on his first appearance at the rooms of the Melbourne German Liedertafel we find to be fully confirmed by the larger audience before whom he appeared last night. Mr John Hill, whether as conductor, as accompanist, or as solo violinist, was equally good, and won the hearty approval of the whole house. The singers—Mr Farley, Miss Winston, Mr Beaumont, and Mr and Mrs Henry Bracy—were all of them in high favour with the audience, and were treated to numerous encores and recalls. The overtures to Semiramide and Oberon were played in very spirited fashion by the opera band. It was a fine entertainment, and resulted successfully to every one concerned.

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

It is by no means a "Black Monday" when Mr Arthur Chappell calls the pupils of his great music school together after a holiday. The summons always meets with a cheerful response, and work begins again with a zest which shows how thoroughly everybody concerned loves it. To this rule, no exception was presented on Monday evening, when, heedless of weather, which could hardly have been more miserable and depressing, St James's Hall was filled by the true amateurs for whom Mr Chappell caters so well. The programme offered no novelty in the form of an instrumental composition; but supporters of the "Monday Pops." have not been spoiled for old favourites by the recent flood of new works. Perhaps all the more because of the flood in question are they disposed to welcome tried and proven things, like Mendelssohn's quintet in A major, Beethoven's pianoforte trio in B flat (Op. 97), and Schubert's fantasia in C for pianoforte and violin. When such as these are in the scheme amateurs know right well how great a treat they may expect; but Monday night's audience were not without a more special attraction. Strange as it may seem, remembering how comparatively frequent have been her visits to this country, it is nevertheless true that Mdlle Marie Krebs had never appeared at Mr Chappell's concerts previous to Monday night. The reason of this, probably, has no significance whatever, but none the less do we congratulate both the director and his patrons upon the fact that the name of one of the most finished and artistic pianists in the world is now numbered in the list adorned by those of Schumann, Goddard, Joachim, Piatti, Hallé, and many other of rank and note. How far the audience were prepared for Mdlle Krebs's appearance was shown by the cheers which greeted her entry. They were no mere conventional matter-of-course cheers, such as are intended to encourage a nervous stranger, but rather a greeting as between friend and friend, for even those who did not remember her as a gifted child bore pleasantly in mind the artist who last year asserted her power among us. Assuming this reception to have shown a keen sense of favours to come, it was more than repaid by a performance of Bach's prelude and fugue in A minor, such as only exceptional skill, both musical and mechanical, could have compassed. The work is one of rare difficulty from an executive point of view; but we are not about to praise Mdlle Krebs with special emphasis simply because she did that which everybody knew was child's play to her nimble and accurate fingers. We commend her rather because she gave the old master's music as it ought to be given; not seeking to achieve the dubious honour of "new reading," venturing upon no liberties with text or time, but being content with the honour due to a faithful and reverent interpreter. By this, we are happy to say, the gifted young lady lost nothing. Her audience, though accustomed of late to the "derring-do" of higher development, were charmed with the purity and brilliancy of her playing, and would gladly have heard the fugue over again. Three times they called Mdlle Krebs back to the platform amid unanimous applause, but the desired encore was firmly—and properly—declined. The impression made by the solo received strength from the subsequent trio and fantasia, in the first of which Mdlle Krebs was associated with Herr Straus and Signor Piatti, in the second with Herr Straus alone; and, altogether, the young pianist's début must be set down as a success not less brilliant than deserved. Her after appearances cannot fail to excite special interest. The vocalist was Miss Edith Wynne, who sang a new song, "Tender and True," by Arthur Sullivan, the beauty of which, aided by a most tasteful rendering, elicited an encore. Mr Zerbini acted as accompanist.—Daily Telegraph.

BEETHOVEN IN HIS LETTERS.

The world's heroes are too often seen only in the fashion of the distinguished lords and gentlemen, whose portraits in oil, life-size, adorn the walls of our public buildings. That is to say, we view them en grande tenue, posed for effect, and with a back-ground which, as a rule, is a purely fancy sketch. As far as Beethoven is concerned this need not be. We can know him, if we will, as other than the wild-haired, scowling man, whom engravings represent jotting down mighty thoughts, with his back to a thunder-cloud. The particulars of his life, his sayings and doings, have been recorded by zealous pens, and these are at our service; best of all, his letters have been collected, and by them the man is shown in his own light, not possibly distorted by the false colouring of others. We would commend a study of Beethoven's letters to all who have received without question the common idea of his character. The illustrious composer is thought of, for the most part, as a rough, morose, cynical, and unlovely man, one whom genius alone made endurable. That there is no foundation for this we do not say, because heavy trials produced their inevitable result upon a proud and sensitive nature. We do aver, however, that the real character of the man was something very different, and need only the support of his letters to establish the case. A few examples of the testimony borne by these witnesses who cannot lie, will assuredly be interesting, and, to make their evidence more conclusive, we will cull only from the epistles of his later years, when the iron of a miserable life had entered deeply into his soul.

We have Beethoven's own assurance that he was adapted by nature to enjoy the pleasures of social intercourse, and piteous were his complaints of the isolation to which deafness condemned him. The geniality that would have made him a favourite everywhere breaks out now and then in the letters to his intimate friends. Writing to Bolderini, he winds up with "Farewell, Knight Falstaff: do not be too dissipated; read the gospel and be converted." Haslinger gets from him this piece of advice: "Sing daily the epistles of St Paul, and daily visit Father Werner, who can show you in his little book how to go straight to heaven. See how anxious I am about the welfare of your soul." To Schindler he says with quiet humour: "The tailor comes to day, still (Poor Beethoven was short of money) I hope to be able to get rid of him for the present by a few polite phrases." Schindler, by the way, was the favourite target at which Beethoven aimed his good-tempered jokes. At one time the composer's future biographer is a "Samothracian vagabond," at another "Most worthy ragamuffin of Epirus and Brundusium," at another, "Master flash in the pan, and wide of the mark! full of reasons, yet devoid of reason," at another "Il Signore nobile, Papageno Schindler," and at another simply "Wiseacre." Once the master wrote to Grillparzer about his friend, "That obtrusive appendage, Schindler, has long been most obnoxious to me." Over and over again does this pleasant banter appear, spite of the great troubles and small worries that made Beethoven their prey; and it is not difficult to see how such passages reveal the true nature of the man. If we did not know the perfect devotion he entertained for art, his affliction might seem a providential interference on behalf of art. Even as it is, we know not how much the world has gained by the barrier which kept Beethoven out of the society he was no less fitted to adorn than to enjoy.

As regards the capacity for loving with which Beethoven was endowed, his letters show it to have been of no ordinary kind. How he cherished an affection for the Countess Guicciardi—how, in fact, his ardent nature was always seeking fellowship with some congenial spirit—is well known. He addresses the Countess as "My Angel! my all! my second self!" and says "Love demands all, and has a right to do so; and thus it is that I feel towards you and you towards me. * * * * My heart is overflowing with all I have to say to you. Ah! there are moments when I find that speech is actually nothing. Continue to be ever my true and only love, my all: as I am yours!" To Bettina von Arnim he writes:—"The most beautiful themes stole from your eyes into my heart, which shall yet enchant the world when Beethoven no longer directs. If God vouchsafes to grant me a few more years of life, I must then see you once more, my dear, most dear friend, for the voice within, to which I always listen, demands this. Spirits may love one another, and I shall ever woo yours. Your approval is dearer to me than all else in the world." Thus could the rugged misanthrope, as some called him, pour out the treasures of his heart where he was sure of a sympathetic response, but we see him do it even more lavishly in the letters to his ward and nephew, Carl. This young man had been left in Beethoven's charge while yet a lad, and upon him the great composer lavished a wealth of affection, which was not only wasted but abused. Carl was a graceless fellow, and when his uncle addressed him as "My dear young scamp," Beethoven was nearer the truth than love permitted him to believe. But the uncle remained faithful to the nephew through both evil and good report, bearing patiently with the rejection of his counsels, and ever receiving the Prodigal (who often returned when reduced to swine-husks) with open arms. We must give a few examples of the old "misanthrope's" enduring affection. He writes to Carl "You must come to me on Sunday," but the scapegrace has more congenial pursuits, and Beethoven meekly replies, "I have no wish to deprive you of any pleasure, were I only sure that you would spend your Sunday properly away from me." Reproving his ward for some disobedience, Beethoven says "If you find the Pactum oppressive, then in God's name I resign you to His holy keeping;" following this up, as though alarmed for the result, with "Do not be afraid to come to me to-morrow." Again he reproves: "My heart has been so deeply wounded by your deceitful conduct that it is difficult to forget it;" whereupon Carl stays away from his uncle's house, and the old man writes, "I wish you at least to come here on Sundays. In vain do I ask for an answer. God help you and me. * * * My continued solitude only still further enfeebles me, and really my weakness often amounts to a swoon. Oh! do not further grieve me." Six days after, Beethoven sends his nephew sixty-two florins for a new suit, and, after advice about the cloth, adds: "Now farewell, my darling! deserve the name; I embrace you, and hope you will be my good, studious, noble son." In very warm weather his thoughts go to poor Carl, and so does a letter beginning—"As in this heat you may, perhaps, wish to bathe, I send you two more florins." Verily what an uncle is here! Carl wants more money, and gets it with this advice: "Now pray, practise economy, for you certainly receive too much cash. I rejoiced when I could assist my poor parents; what a contrast are you in your conduct to me. Thriftless boy, farewell!" The heat continues, and Beethoven sends another florin, with "Do not neglect your bathing; continue well, and guard against illness. Spend your money on good objects alone. Be my dear son." Carl again misbehaves—borrows money of a "mean, old kitchen wench," and is sternly asked "Why such hypocrisy?" Then comes the salve: "But do not be uneasy; I shall continue to care for you as much as ever;" upon which Carl went on as badly as ever. One more quotation must suffice. Beethoven writes to the ne'er-do-weel: "My dear son, say no more; only come to my arms; not one harsh word shall you hear. You shall be received as lovingly as ever * * * only come. Come to the faithful heart of your father." We might multiply these proofs of Beethoven's great loving spirit, but the foregoing will suffice to show that he was not the savage popularly supposed; that, in short, his nature was tender and affectionate, though circumstances overlaid it with an appearance of unloveliness.

JOSEPH BENNETT.

COBURG.—A new romantic three-act opera, Lenore, has been successfully produced at the Court Theatre. The libretto is founded on Bürger's celebrated ballad. The music is composed by Dr O. Bach, Artistic Director of the Mozarteum, Salzburg. Mad. Sadler-Grün distinguished herself very much as the heroine. The Duke of Coburg has bestowed on the composer the Knight's Cross, with the Crown, of the Ernest House Order.

BAIREUTH.—Herr Richard Wagner has had the front of his house, which is circular in form, ornamented with sgraffiti, at the expense of the King of Bavaria, his royal patron and friend. These sgraffiti are a kind of black and white frescoes, with which the fronts of houses used to be adorned in Italy, and of which numerous examples are still to be found there. Herr Krauss, the historical painter, has executed a grand allegory taken partly from the Nibelungen. In the middle is seen Wodan, as the personification of the German myth. He is represented as a traveller, attended by his two ravens. To his right is beheld Tragedy, and, to his left, Music, with young Siegfried, as personifying the art-works of the Future.

RICHARD WAGNER'S REMINISCENCES OF SPONTINI.

(From "Le Ménestrel.")

II.

We recommenced our studies, therefore, by a pianoforte rehearsal, so that the master might be able to communicate his intentions to his interpreters. To tell the truth, this labour taught us very little fresh. Spontini laid less stress upon the details than on his views of the work as a whole, and was fond of launching out at length on its general conception. I observed, by the way, that he was accustomed to adopt a singularly peremptory tone, even with the most famous artists, such as Mad. Schröder-Devrient and Tichatscheck certainly were. He forbade the latter to employ the word braut (bride), which Licinius used when addressing Julia in the German text. The word jarred horribly on his ears, and he was unable to understand, he said, how any person could couple so flat and vulgar a sound to music. As for the artist, a very inferior one, by the way, charged with the part of the Grand Priest, Spontini gave him a long lesson on the manner in which this personage is to be understood. He deduced his character from the conversation he has with the Augur. He showed that all the High Priest's calculations were based on religious superstition and the machinations of the other priests. The Pontiff ought to give us to understand that he had nothing to fear, not even an adversary who held the army in his hands, since he was sure, come what might, that all would turn out well for him; because, supposing the worst to happen, and that Julia were snatched from execution, he could, by effecting as he chose the miracle which would instantaneously rekindle the sacred fire of Vesta, save the sacerdotal influence. In a conversation which I had with Spontini concerning his instrumentation, I asked the reason of his not having utilised the trombones in the magnificent triumphal march of the first act, when he had employed them so energetically in several other passages of his opera. "Est-ce que je n'y ai pas de trombones?"* ("Have I no trombones there?") he answered, with genuine surprise. For all reply, I showed him a copy of the engraved score. He instantly asked me to write a trombone part for the march, begging me to do so at once, so that he might judge of its effect at the first band rehearsal. He said, also, "J'ai entendu dans votre Rienzi, un instrument que vous appelez basse-tuba; je ne veux pas bannir cet instrument de l'orchestre; faites m'en une partie pour La Vestale" ("I heard in your Rienzi an instrument you call a bass-tuba; I will not banish it from the orchestra; so write me a part for it in The Vestal.").—I experienced genuine pleasure in conforming to his desires, and in carrying them out with moderation and discretion. When he heard for the first time at rehearsal the effect of the instruments thus added, he did not fail to cast a glance of grateful satisfaction towards me. This favourable impression remained in his mind, for he subsequently wrote me a very affectionate letter from Paris, asking for the little score of the instrumental supplement. His pride, however, would not let him acknowledge frankly that he desired anything of which I was the author; and this feeling was betrayed by the roundabout terms he employed. "Envoyez-moi," he wrote, "une partition des trombones pour la marche triomphale, et de la basse-tuba, telle qu'elle a été exécutée sous ma direction à Dresde" ("Send me a score of the trombones for the triumphal march, and of the bass-tuba, as executed under my direction at Dresden").

One of the most characteristic circumstances which marked our getting up of the piece was the energy with which Spontini brought out, nay, even exaggerated, the rhythmical accent. To attain the effect he desired, he had adopted the habit at Berlin of marking the strong bars by the word Diese (this one), of which I did not at first understand the signification. Tichatscheck was especially pleased with this method, for he was so enamoured of rhythm that he always insisted upon precision of attack whenever any important parts were to be taken up by the chorus. He was convinced that if the first note was struck with certainty, the remainder would follow as a matter of course.—Everyone bowed submissively to the composer's wishes, and took a deep interest in him. The tenors alone were angry with him a long time for a terrible fright he had given them. It happened that in the quivering accompaniment of Julia's sombre cantilena, at the end of the second act, the execution did not at all agree with the composer's intentions. Turning towards the tenors, he said in a sepulchral voice: "Est-ce que les altos sont morts?" ("Are the tenors dead?") Terrified by this adjuration, two pale hypocondriacs, who, despite their right to a pension, would insist on retaining the first desk, nearly fell off their stools, and turned towards Spontini with haggard eyes and distorted features. It seemed as though they had just heard the passing bell, and that they saw the tomb gaping to receive them. I endeavoured to recall them to life by explaining in a perfectly prosaical style what the composer wanted them to do.—Spontini could see I was devoted to him by the zeal I displayed in modifying, according to his notions, the arrangement of our instrumental army. The order in which he wanted his musicians placed resulted less from any system than from an inveterate habit. But this habit possessed an extreme importance, which I understood perfectly, when the master deigned to explain it to me. "Je dirige," he said, "non pas avec la main mais avec le regard; mon œil gauche est premier, mon œil droit second violon. Or, pour conduire avec les yeux, il faut renoncer aux lunettes, lors même qu'on a la vue courte. Voilà ce que ne comprennent pas une foule de mauvais batteurs de mesure. Quant à moi," he added, "je vous le dis en confidence, je ne vois pas plus loin que le bout de mon nez, et pourtant, d'un coup d'œil, je fais exécuter tout ce que je veux." ("I conduct not with my hand but with my glance; my right eye is first, and my left eye second violin. Now, to conduct with the eyes, one must renounce spectacles, even when one is shortsighted. This is something not understood by a host of wretched time-beaters. As for me, I will tell you in confidence that I cannot see further than the tip of my nose, and yet with a glance I make the orchestra execute whatever I choose.") With regard to the order in which Spontini desired the members of the band to be placed, it was certainly characterised by more than one illogical detail. Thus, in conformity with the Parisian fashion, the oboists were stationed immediately behind him. The two artists were thus obliged to turn the bells of their instruments towards the audience, and one of them, the first oboe, was so mortified that I had all the trouble in the world with him. But, with the exception of such slight mistakes, Spontini's ideas were founded upon a perfectly rational principle, though it is one not yet recognized, even at the present day, in most German orchestras.

According to this method, the mass of strings is distributed over the whole orchestra. The brass and the instruments of percussion are arranged on the two sides. The other wind instruments, which somewhat resemble, by the softness of their tone, stringed instruments, are placed, as a matter of course, between the violins, which they connect. In opposition to this system, very many of our most numerous and most renowned orchestras still admit the division of the instrumental mass into two distinct parts, placing all the strings on one side and all the wind on the other. This faulty arrangement produces, of necessity, a rugged and violent effect, where the various kinds of sound cannot be blended, the different voices of the orchestra never being successfully condensed into round and homogeneous sonority. As regards myself, I was much pleased at the innovation introduced by Spontini; for, thanks to the initiative taken by him, I had no difficulty in obtaining an order from the King, retaining the new arrangement. Nothing remained for me to do after Spontini's departure, but to modify certain details, and to reform certain logical errors, in order to effect a thoroughly normal and rational arrangement.

Despite all his singularities, Spontini exerted a very real ascendancy, a genuine fascination, on the artists of the theatre. Every one, consequently, exhibited extraordinary zeal, and endeavoured to contribute his share towards the brilliancy of the performance announced. While all this was going on in the orchestra, Herr Eduard Devrient was busy on the stage, and had succeeded in drilling the choral masses perfectly. Among other things, it was he who supplied us with the means of satisfying Spontini on a point to which he attached great importance, and which singularly embarrassed us. In conformity with the tradition of the German stage, we had determined on concluding The Vestal by the impassioned duet which Julia, accompanied by the chorus, sings with Licinius, at the moment of her deliverance. But the composer insisted strongly on restoring the part which had been cut out. He wanted his work to end with a ballet and a chorus of joy, agreeably to the poetic law of French opera. He was averse to seeing his sparkling score die out miserably on the place of execution. He desired, at any price, a final picture in a new scene, representing the sacred grove of Venus. There, mid dancing and shouts of joy, the triumphant pair was to be conducted to the altar, by the priests and priestesses crowned with roses. His desire was gratified. Unfortunately, this modification at the last hour was not destined to procure for us a success for which we all prayed.

ORGAN NEWS.

The organ at Christ Church, Lancaster Gate, was opened on Sunday last, by the organist, Dr Verrinder, who displayed the instrument to great advantage, after its being re-constructed, under his direction, by Messrs Bishop and Son. The instrument was originally in Winchester Cathedral, and was purchased by Mr Willis, nearly twenty years ago. The following is a list of stops contained in the modernised structure, those marked * being new or prepared.

VIENNA.—Mad. Lucca has been giving a series of performances at the Imperial Operahouse. The character she chose for her farewell was that of Selica in L'Africaine.—A new kind of Sacred Concert has been very popular lately. The performance is accompanied by magnificent transparencies, painted by the leading artists of this capital, and representing the Biblical and other scenes described by the music. Among the works thus given have been some by Franz Schubert, Johannes Brahms, Moritz Hauptmann, the Grand-Duchess Constantin, Clotilde Welker, Franz Liszt, Ella Adajewska, and R. Schumann.—The fourth Hellmesberger Quartet-Evening was devoted principally to works by Beethoven, in commemoration of the 104th anniversary of that master's birth. The programme included his B flat major Trio, Op. 97, and his F major Quartet, Op. 135. The concert opened, however, with a Stringed Quartet in D minor by Herr Herbeck, which may be considered a novelty, for, though composed in 1862, it had been performed only on two previous occasions.

MUSIC AT BRUSSELS.

Fate is proving kinder to M. Campocasso towards the close of his management than it was at the beginning. The houses at the Théâtre de la Monnaie have continued excellent for some time past, and the public appear suddenly to have become enthusiastic for a place of entertainment towards which they previously displayed, not simply apathy, but almost repugnance. M. Salomon, the tenor, has bid farewell to his admirers here—and they are numerous—and returned to the Opera in Paris. Speaking of this gentleman, the Guide Musical observes, in the following extract, of which the conclusion seems to clash somewhat with the commencement:—

"Everything promises M. Salomon a brilliant and lucrative future on the stage. He possesses a collection of superb notes, and is evidently becoming less awkward. Some few months' more work will render him bearable as an actor, but we do not think he is destined ever to shine very vividly at the Paris Opera. Whatever he may do, he will always be deficient in warmth; he will never be anything more than a voice. In Paris this is not sufficient to ensure even a tenor lasting triumphs."

Martha has been given with MM. Petit and Richard as Plumket and Lionel, but neither gentleman was as good as he had been in Faust. It is to be hoped that they will both be more successful in La Perle du Brésil, which, as already announced in these columns, has been in preparation for several months. The Corporation has contributed more than twenty thousand francs towards the expense of getting it up. The scenery will, it is said, be magnificent, and the dresses dazzling, while the composer is delighted by what he has seen of the rehearsals. M. Campocasso has, however, renounced the idea of giving Die Zauberflöte, as he does not deem it advisable to devote two months to getting up a single work, when his term of management extends only to four months. He will, however, perform Le Nozze di Figaro and La Reine de Chypre.

The programme of the third Popular Concert of Classical Music included Symphony No. 1, B minor, Robert Schumann; "Les Noces féodales," a Symphonic fragment by Emile Mathieu (first time), "Concertstück for the Oboe," Gluckardt (executed by M. Pletinckx, Professor at the Royal Conservatory); "Hungarian Rhapsody," Franz Liszt; and the overture to Die Meistersinger von Nüremberg, R. Wagner.

SINCE THEN.

(Copyright.)

It was harvest time, so gladsome,
When in accents soft and low,
He beguiled my poor heart, Mother,
Only one short year ago.

And I saw the tear-drop glisten
In his tender eyes, that fell,
Tho' he turned aside to hide it
When he bade me fond farewell.

And all that night I listened
To the sobbing of the rain,
But his voice came stealing thro' it,
Like a sad and sweet refrain.

Since then I've watched and waited,
For he said he'd come again,
When the bloom was on the heather,
And the gold was on the grain.

And I saw him yester even
With a look so changed and cold,
Tho' he smiled on one beside him,
But not my sweet smile of old.

Oh, do not blame him, Mother,
She is rich and I am poor,
And his heart has left its gladness
In "the days that are no more."

LOUISA GRAY.

ODESSA.—The censure here seems to mingle severity and absurdity pretty equally in its proceedings. It forbade the production of M. Offenbach's well-known work as La Grande Duchesse de Gérolstein, but allowed it to be performed as Le Sabre de mon Père.

NEW MUSIC HALL IN GLASGOW.

The new buildings will cover a plot of ground having a frontage of about 200 feet to Granville Street, and 160 feet to Berkeley Street and Kent Road, thus occupying over 3,500 square yards of building ground. On the principal floor is the main entrance from Granville Street. Passing through a handsome vestibule, and then through an octagonal hall (36 feet in diameter), the great hall is reached, which is 75 feet wide and 140 feet long. This length, however, does not include the north gallery and recess for organ at the south end; with these, the grand total reaches 186 feet. The galleries, which are arranged somewhat after the fashion of those in the City Hall, will accommodate about 650. Of course, in addition to this, there is ample provision made for a large orchestra and chorus in front of the organ. The great hall will be provided with six distinct exits, a matter of vast importance at all large meetings. Minor facilities and accommodation have been carefully considered. Right and left of the principal entrance, cloak rooms have been provided. Between these and the great hall are conversation and refreshment rooms, each about 75 feet by 40, both having communication with the great hall. As the ceilings of the cloak room fronting Granville Street are only half the height of those of the conversation and refreshment rooms, an entresol is placed above them, divided into five apartments, suitable for small meetings, these having a special entrance from Berkeley Street. The whole upper floor of the west half of the buildings is arranged as a complete suite of assembly rooms, spacious in their dimensions. To the larger rooms are attached every convenience in the shape of assembling and retiring rooms.

The basement, or sunk floor, has been fully utilized. It contains, amongst other things, steam boilers and steam engines to insure proper means for heating and ventilating the whole building, artists' rooms, waiting rooms for servants, a hall-keeper's house, and a well-ordered kitchen, with hoist. The remaining space of the basement floor contains accommodation for storing the forms of the great hall, when these are not required, as well as 700 square yards of storage. These stores can be easily let, as they possess separate stairs and goods access from Berkeley Street.

The accommodating powers of the great hall will be best understood by comparison. The hall of the Queen's Rooms contains 5707 feet of floorage; the City Hall, 10,129; whilst the great hall of the new undertaking will contain 15,565. This means that at oratorio concerts and festivals (when a full orchestra and large chorus must be accommodated on the platforms) the Queen's Rooms can seat comfortably about 1,000 of an audience; the City Hall, 1,900; and the new hall, 2920. In addition to this large total, the new concert hall will provide ample room for 100 orchestral performers and 550 of a chorus. Nor should we omit to state that on special occasions the City Hall has actually held (when uncomfortably packed) as many as 3,400 persons; under the same pressure the new hall will contain 5,224. Ample means are provided for the egress of the exhausted air, and by mechanical appliances a continuous stream of fresh air is admitted; so that the audiences will not be subjected to the stifling atmosphere which they are usually obliged in Glasgow to inhale at a crowded meeting. Besides, the great extra height of the new hall—nearly twice as high as that of the City Hall—will give a considerable increase of cubic space to each individual member of the audience. The proportions are as 310·8 cubic feet to 781·2 in the gross, or, per head as 163 to about 280. It may be added, that Sir Michael Costa, when in Glasgow during the Festival week, carefully and minutely examined the plans from a musician's point of view, and whilst expressing himself thoroughly satisfied with the general design of the large concert-room, made one or two suggestions regarding the arrangements of the platform for orchestra and chorus. These suggestions having been adopted, Sir Michael, who is, perhaps, the highest authority on such matters, stated his conviction that the new hall will prove one of the most perfect and commodious in Europe for musical performances.

A few of our leading citizens have, by considerable personal exertion, brought the project to its present promising position, and at the same time have become large shareholders. The actual capital required to bring this great scheme to a successful issue amounts to £80,000. Of that sum, nearly £60,000 have been already subscribed, entirely by the promoters and their immediate friends. It remains for the general public to come forward, and, by taking up the remaining shares, make this public-spirited undertaking a great success. It would be a disgrace to the city which claims to hold the second place amongst the cities of the empire in respect of population, wealth, and enterprise, to let the new halls start burdened with any debt whatever. Their promoters deserve, as they will certainly receive, the gratitude of the entire community.

The plan was entrusted to the late Mr Cunningham, C.E., of Liverpool, the excellence of whose work in the Philharmonic Hall of that city is perhaps unrivalled in its way, and with him was associated Mr Campbell Douglas, of this city. A drawing of the proposed buildings is now exhibited in the Royal Exchange. PURPLE POWIS.

LONDON BALLAD CONCERTS.

On Saturday afternoon, at St James's Hall, the first "London Ballad Concert" of the season was given, and, as usual, a very large audience attended. The "ballad" is a peculiarly English form of vocal music, and in no country have ballads so strong a hold on the affections of the people as in England. The "Volks-Lieder" of Germany, the "Jotas" of Spain, the "Jodel" songs of Switzerland, have far less hold on native sympathies than those ballads which are endeared to us by poetic as well as musical beauty. It was a happy thought of Mr John Boosey, when, some years back, he instituted a series of Ballad Concerts, at which the dear old songs, delighting us as they delighted our forefathers, were sung by our best native vocalists. These concerts have also afforded opportunities for the presentation of new ballads by modern composers, and many charming additions to the repertory have thus gained a hearing which might otherwise have been denied. The concert may be taken as a fair specimen of the class of entertainments for which musical amateurs are indebted to Mr Boosey. The list of what may be called "classical" ballads included "Barbara Allen," and Knight's "Of what is the old man thinking?"—both expressively given by Mrs Osborne Williams; the old Irish ballad, "The pretty girl milking her cow;" a Welsh ballad, "The maid of Sker;" and Dr Arne's "Cease your funning:" sung respectively by Miss Sterling, Mr Lloyd, and Madame Lemmens-Sherrington. The Scotch ditty, "We're a' noddin," was sung by Miss Sterling; and thus the music of every part of the United Kingdom was illustrated. Among the new things heard for the first time, the most successful was a canzonet, by Mr Arthur Sullivan, entitled "Living poems." The words are the well-known verses of Longfellow, "Come to me, O ye children!" and Mr Sullivan's setting is characterized by the rarest grace and sympathy, combined with fresh and appropriate melody. It was admirably sung by Miss Edith Wynne, and unanimously encored. A new ballad, "Forget me not," by Mr Gatty, given charmingly by Mrs Osborne Williams, deserves to become popular. The programme contained a host of attractions, including altogether no less than twenty-six pieces, some of which were allotted to Mr Sims Reeves and Mr Santley, both of whom were enthusiastically greeted. The great English tenor sang Blumenthal's "My Queen," and Balfe's "Come into the garden, Maud," in his best manner; and Mr Santley gave J. L. Hatton's "Fair is my love," Molloy's "Polly," and two of Schumann's Lieder, with consummate finish. Not the least enjoyable portion of the entertainment was the singing of the London Vocal Union, a body of eight voices, directed by Mr Frederick Walker, vicar-choral of St Paul's Cathedral. These gave part-songs, glees and madrigals in a manner recalling the best days of the "Orpheus Glee Union;" and their efforts were rewarded with plaudits and encores justly merited. The only instrumental music was furnished by Mdlle Delphine Le Brun, an accomplished pianist, who played, in masterly style, Heller's "Forelle," and Sir Julius Benedict's new pianoforte fantasia, "America." This piece is chiefly composed of variations on "The Star-Spangled Banner," with some slight references to "Hail Columbia" and "Yankee Doodle," the last only American by adoption. The composition (expressly intended by its distinguished author for Mad. Arabella Goddard) affords good opportunities for the display of executive ability, and of these Mdlle Le Brun availed herself ably. The accompaniments were played by Herr Meyer Lutz, whose abilities are too well known to need commendation, and the concert was in all respects enjoyable.—Observer.

ROME.—Les Huguenots has been produced at the Teatro Apollo with the following cast: Valentine, Signora Wizjak; the Queen, Signora Pernini; the Page, Signora Braccialini; Raoul, Sig. Niccolini; Marcel, Sig. Castelmary; Nevers, Sig. Viganotti; St Bris, Sig. Alzina. Signora Wizjak is a great favourite. The same applies to Sig. Niccolini. La Forza del Destino was to be the next opera. There is a report that the Municipality will not make any grant to the Apollo after the present season.

PROFESSOR AUGUSTUS WILHELMJ.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH BY PROFESSOR RICHARD WÜERST, ROYAL PRUSSIAN DIRECTOR OF MUSIC AT BERLIN.

Augustus Emil Daniel Frederic Victor Wilhelmj, the descendant of a very old and highly-respectable German family, was born on the 21st September, 1845, at the ancient town of Usengen, in the Duchy of Nassau, his father being a barrister and Doctor at Law of the Royal Prussian Supreme Court. The mother of Augustus Wilhelmj, Charlotte neé Petry, has played no small part in her time as an excellent songstress and pianist, having received her final musical education from Frederic Chopin, at Paris. Wilhelmj was taught the violin, in the first instance, by Conrad Fischer, director of music to the Duke of Nassau at Wiesbaden. He must have made very rapid progress at the time (the beginning of 1852), for, when Henriette Sontag (Countess Rossi) visited Wilhelmj's family at Wiesbaden, the young violinist, only seven years old, played in her presence with such skill that the lady embraced and kissed him, exclaiming: "You will certainly some day become the German Paganini." The eminent talents of Wilhelmj developed themselves amazingly under the tuition of Fischer, and in November, 1853, he played for the first time one of the quatuors of Haydn, showing as much pluck, certainty, and musical tact as though he had been playing the work for years. On the 8th of January, 1854, Wilhelmj made his début in public at a concert given for benevolent purposes at Limburg, and his second appearance took place at Wiesbaden the 17th March, 1856, at the Theater Royal.

Dr Wilhelmj, the father, had, in spite of the great musical talents of his son, wished him to follow the law, but consented ultimately to his adoption of music, provided a competent authority pronounced in favour of his capacity. In spring, 1861, Wilhelmj went for this purpose to Franz Liszt at Weimar, and played before the great man Spohr's 8th Concerto (scena cantante) and the Hungarian Airs of Ernst. Liszt, who accompanied Wilhelmj on the piano, immediately perceived that he had to do with no common talent, but with a youth possessed of extraordinary musical endowments. After Wilhelmj had played some smaller pieces prima vista, Liszt left the piano and exclaimed: "What? and they were considering the career you should choose! Why you are born for music, and if the fiddle had not been invented it would have had to be invented for you especially. Young man, study diligently, and you may depend on it, the world will yet talk of you." Some days after this Liszt took Wilhelmj to Ferdinand David, saying, "I have brought you the second Paganini!"

From 1861 to 1864 Wilhelmj studied at the Royal Academy at Leipzig, his teachers being Hauptmann, Richter, and, afterwards, Joachim Raff. Ferdinand David chiefly directed his education, and it is due to him that Wilhelmj has such a classical style of playing. Wilhelmj soon became the favourite scholar of the Conservatoire, and was considered as a great wonder by his colleagues. It was a favourite remark of David's, that "he could conscientiously state that there were no difficulties existing which Wilhelmj could not easily surmount." At an examination of the Academy in 1862, Wilhelmj attained immense success by playing the very difficult Concerto Pathetique (F sharp minor) of Ernst.

In November of the same year he appeared at the Gewandhaus Concerts, playing the Hungarian Concerto of Joseph Joachim.

Wilhelmj lived at the house of his teacher, David, and there made the acquaintance of David's niece, Baroness de Liphardt, which lady he espoused on the 29th May, 1866. A very severe attack of typhus fever, which overtook him shortly afterwards, prevented Wilhelmj for some time from following his studies; but as soon as he was well he resumed them with ardour. His first concert tour took place in 1865, and in 1866 he visited Holland, afterwards crossing to Great Britain, where, thanks to the exertions of Jenny Lind, he appeared at Covent Garden Theatre, under the late Mr Alfred Mellon, and made a great sensation. Wilhelmj next visited Paris, and played at the popular concerts for classical music, given by M. Pasdeloup. The newspapers were unanimous in declaring that Wilhelmj was the greatest violinist they had ever heard, calling him "le nouveau Paganini." After these successes Wilhelmj returned again to the Rhine, as the French papers proudly observed, "inconnu hier, le voilà célébré aujourdhui."

In 1867 Wilhelmj went to Italy. At Florence he had the title, "Protector of the Societa di Quartetto," confered on him. From Italy he went to Russia, at the invitation of the Grand Duchess Helena Paulowna of Russia. At St Petersburgh Wilhelmj lived with Hector Berlioz and other celebrities at the Palais Michel, doing his share towards many interesting musical evenings for which the salons of this art-loving Grand Duchess were famous. It was here that Berlioz said of him, "I have never before heard such a noble tone as Wilhelmj's, and I must admit that his playing is quite phenomenal.

During the season of 1868—1869, Wilhelmj once more visited Switzerland, France, and Belgium; and, the next year, he made a tour with Mr Santley to the principal towns of England, Scotland, and Ireland, everywhere meeting with the greatest applause. During the bad times of the French war, Wilhelmj did much to ameliorate the sufferings of the poor and wounded. He gave several concerts for this purpose at Wiesbaden, Darmstadt, Mayence, etc., etc. In 1871 we find the young violinist in Holland, where he met with even more success than before. At Leyden he was received with a torchlight procession. During the season of 1871-72 Wilhelmj gave concerts in Sweden, Norway, and Denmark. It is curious that he did not undertake a concert tour in his own country till 1872-73. At that time he visited the North of Germany, the Russian Baltic provinces, Posen, Galicia, and the Austrian Crownlands. Wilhelmj put in his first appearance at Berlin in October, 1872, where he played at the Singacademie, and at Vienna, in March, 1873, at the Great Music Hall, the success he attained in these capitals being enormous.

Wilhelmj has tried composing with much success, and has written some works for the violin, original songs, a marriage cantata, for soli, chorus, and orchestra, and finally some sacred music. In regard to his specialty as a violinist, it is acknowledged that he stands equally high both as a soloist and quartet player. On this point, however, the English public will soon have another opportunity of deciding.

AN OLD ROMANCE—1793.

Translated—Copyright.

I.

The star of eve, in beauty chaste,
Shone brightly o'er the camp of France,
A youth was placed to guard the waste,
Who sang thus, resting on his lance:
"Haste, refreshing zephyrs, go,
And to my friends this story bear;
Say I watch those plains to show
That love and g'ory are my care."

II.

By the foes' dull glim'ring light,
In silence see their guards advance,
While to abridge the tardy night
The Frenchman sings, upon his lance;
"Haste, refreshing zephyrs, go,
And to my friends my story bear;
Say I watch those fields to show
That love and glory are my care.

III.

"The day-star will the fight recall,
When vict'ry will my fame enhance;
But should it be my lot to fall,
And die upon my trusty lance,
Then in pity, zephyr, fly,
And to my friends this story bear;
Say until my latest sigh
That love and glory were my care."

WELLINGTON GUERNSEY.

BERLIOZ's Damnation de Faust was performed at the Paris Conservatoire lately, and, it is said, met with a warm reception.

THERE is talk of producing Handel's Hercules at the next Festival of the Lower Rhine, under the direction of Joseph Joachim, who has already made the work known in Berlin.

CONSULTATION ABOUT MAD. CHRISTINE NILSSON.

Les Médecins Soussignés sont d'avis de ce qui suit :— L'irritation bronchique et l'enrouement qui ont retenu Mme Nilsson jusqu'à ce jour, ont nécessité l'emploi des moyens les plus actifs. Des altérations de la voix, qui ont mis la malade tout-à-fait hors d'état de chanter, il reste un peu de raucité et quelque difficulté dans l'émission des sons ; difficulté qui ne lui permettra pas de reprendre son service à l'opera avant une quinzaine de jours.

The Musical World,

LONDON, SATURDAY, JANUARY 16, 1875.

ON Monday next will take place in St James's Hall the 500th concert of the series begun, under Mr Arthur S. Chappell's management, on February 14, 1859. By a happy decision, the programme then put forward will in great part be presented again, but not in conjunction with the same performers. Of the artists who appeared in 1859, only three—Sir J. Benedict, Herr Ries, and Signor Piatti—are announced for Monday next. M. Wieniawski is in Brussels, Mr Doyle has long terminated his connection with Mr Chappell's enterprise, and M. Schreurs has disappeared from public life. The three who remain at their posts, however, suffice for a personal link, between the first concert and its 500th successor, the marvel being that, amid the constant changes which take place in the musical world, so many of the original performers are available. Under circumstances of such interest, it may not be out of place to reproduce the notice of the first concert from the number of the Musical World for February 19, 1859, simply premising that Mr Chappell had been giving a series of miscellaneous performances, which the "Monday Pops," as we now know them, succeeded :—

"It might have been imagined that some hazard would attend the new policy of the directors of these entertainments in giving a series of classical concerts so soon after the 'miscellaneous.' The directors, however, proved the best judges, and the success of last Monday night's performance may justify them in believing that they hit upon the most orthodox way of pleasing the public. No doubt there has been a good deal of taste displayed in the experiment. Mendelssohn's name is a tower of strength, and the programme of the first concert was selected entirely from his chamber music. Mendelssohn, unaided, as had been often proved by M. Jullien, was sure to attract the multitude. But there was this drawback, apparently, against the Monday Popular Concerts, that, no band being employed, there could be no symphony and no overture. That chamber music, however, can charm even 'popular' assemblies, was triumphantly proved on the present occasion. The programme was a model of its kind. While conciliating the most refined taste, it was equally calculated to gratify the uninitiated. The grand pieces in each part were the quintet in B flat (Op. 87), and the quartet in D major (Op. 44), for stringed instruments. The first was executed by M. Wieniawski, Herr Ries, Mr Doyle, M. Schreurs, and Signor Piatti ; the second by the same, excluding Mr Doyle. Both were magnificent performances, and created genuine enthusiasm. The last movement of the quartet was obstinately redemanded, but the compliment was merely acknowledged by the performers. Mr Wieniawski's playing was incomparable in the quintet—taste, feeling, expression, style, tone and execution all combining to make a perfect whole. His performance in the quartet was extremely fine, although occasional exceptions might be taken to his reading. We need not say how ably M. Wieniawski was supported by his coadjutors. Besides what we have specified, Messrs Benedict and Wieniawski played the Sonata in F minor (Op. 4), for piano and violin, and Mr Benedict and Signor Piatti the Tema con variazioni in D (Op. 17), for piano and violoncello."

How far the tone of encouragement and confidence which appears in this earliest notice of the Monday Popular Concerts has been justified by results we need not stop to point out.

Apropos of the 500th concert, we are not going to praise the enterprise with which it is associated. The concert itself is praise enough, inasmuch as everything significant of good management, steady perseverance, and all the merits that command success, may be seen in the figures which designate it. But, while laudation is unnecessary, we cannot refrain from making some reflections suggested by the event of Monday next. In the first place, we see the advantage of quietly working out a good idea, without reference to immediate results. It is no secret that, for several years, the Monday Popular Concerts did not pay their expenses, and had the director looked only to this fact they would long since have come to an end. But Mr Chappell had an eye to the future, and faith in what it would bring forth. To him the years of loss were only as the time when seed lies hidden beneath the surface of the ground. The harvest was to come, and it came in greater abundance, perhaps, than the most sanguine expected. So will time always fight for a good cause, and for those who, identified with good causes, know how to possess their souls in patience. The 500th Concert testifies, also, the value of firmness and decision in carrying out an artistic enterprise. How far Mr Chappell has been tempted again and again to depart from his original and severely classical design, only he can tell; but it is easy to assume that no small share of resolution was necessary, in order to keep in the path at first marked out. The danger passed away long ago, but none the less should the firmness which met it be recognized; and all the more should the fact be insisted on that good things never fail to surround themselves, in course of time, with the sympathy necessary for support. The Monday Popular Concerts have made their own public, to whom they are, so to speak, a necessity. They belong to that public, and Mr Chappell simply acts as agent, free from risk, while getting what he can for his trouble. This is the reward of years of steady work, looking neither to the right hand nor to the left. Who will say that the reward is too great; or that it is other than a notable encouragement?

The whole subject has such obvious teachings connected with it, and assumes such unmistakable significance, that nothing more need be said about it. In common with all who desire the good of music, we congratulate Mr Chappell upon the event of Monday night, we congratulate the amateurs who are scarcely less interested in it, and we congratulate the art which is most interested of all.

—o—

THE Fine Arts, truly observes the Guide Musical, all possess a special literature of their own. The facts are naturally laconic; not so the discussions arising out of matters of taste involved in them. Many a painting covering only a small extent of canvas has caused thousands of reams of paper to be blackened with ink, and more than one dreamy commentator on Shakespeare, the poet who saw—would be ready and willing to write a bulky folio upon every stone to which Shakespeare may have alluded, supposing it had been subjected to the chisel of a Benvenuto Cellini, or any other sculptor of equal or less note. When books of this description mix up biography with criticism, and do not speak exclusively a technical language, they may undoubtedly possess some interest for the ordinary reader, and exert a certain influence upon the tone of literature in general. With regard to music, however—if we except a certain number of special works, such as those by Azevedo, Barbedette, Holmes, Otto Jahn, Sigismond Neukomm, Nissen, Oulibicheff, Arthur Pougin, Victor Schœlcher, A. Sowinski, Thayer, Wilder, Lenz, and a few others—we boast of no musical biography which can attract any save musicians.

The isolation of music, with regard to the other fine arts and to literature, is proved by the extremely rare occasions on which we come across citations derived from it. Every day we find writers speaking familiarly of painting, without themselves being painters. The description of some scene or landscape serves to introduce a reference to a picture or an artist; but it is far more rarely that we meet with any allusion to the Pastoral Symphony of Beethoven or the Seasons of Haydn.

That music, which exercises a more prompt, not to say a deeper, impression on the human mind than any other art, should not yet have supplied the language of literature with more of those happy terms which recall it to the memory, is a fact to be explained partly by its origin, and partly by its nature. In the first place, Music is the youngest of the Fine Arts. At the period of the Renaissance, poetry, painting, sculpture, and architecture seem to have been transmitted to us from antiquity, united and grouped together like sister-muses, each presenting mankind with material and appreciable results. Music, on the contrary, which, among the ancients, was, probably, nothing more than a kind of improvised recitative, did not form a portion of the group. Thus, for classic music, there was no new birth, or Renaissance; for classic music, there were no echoes of the past. It was forgotten as though it had never existed, being scarcely mentioned, even as a kind of reminiscence, by those who sought something altogether modern and original.

Musical criticism, lastly, is the most professional of all criticism: everything which, in music, is popular and unprofessional, cannot be conveyed in words; we see the products of other arts, but we feel those of music. The theory and criticism of painting are eminently picturesque; the pen of more than one pictorial critic we could name possesses all the power and all the colour of Rembrandt's brush, and poets succeed in pourtraying truthfully even that really heavenly beauty which sometimes lights up the human countenance; but we have never yet met with anyone, however eloquent he might be, capable of expressing his sensations on hearing an adagio of Beethoven's, except by outbursts of uniform enthusiasm—or by silence, which is, perhaps, more significant.

Despite these facts, however, we are surprised that the biography of composers should, as a rule, be so concise and so sparingly supplied with those details of private life which familiarise us with men of genius in other arts. Musicians may, not without good and sufficient grounds, be ranked among those inspired beings who sometimes speak to the soul the language of prophecy—among the interpreters of Nature and of Nature's oracles, the mysterious purport of which they alone can translate. Of all forms of power exercised by human art, that by which a great composer—

"Seizes the soul, and, in his giant grasp,
Bears it, entranc'd and captive, unto Heav'n," ought to inspire us with an eager wish to learn a little of him from whom it emanates.

Nor is the history of musicians deficient in those instances of picturesque originality, and of contrasted individuality, which lend a dramatic interest to all biography. Some musical artists have played an important part in the life of nations, especially as regards social development. From John Marbeck, of Windsor, who, by his Musical Services, consoled himself and his fellow-religionists under persecution, and Marenzio, who fell a victim to a Pope's hatred, down to the composer of Die Wacht am Rhein, leading a people in arms to battle and to victory; from Josquin, styled by Adami, "L'uomo insigne per l'invenzione," down to Mendelssohn, the regenerator of Greek and of French tragedy, the world has been agitated by numerous revolutions to which Music was no stranger, and musicians were frequently actors in various scenes of this human drama. The lives of some of them are fully as remarkable and interesting as those of any of the poets. N. V. N.

MDME NILSSON.

(From "Le Ménéstrel.")

La santé de Mdme Nilsson ne permet pas encore de fixer le jour précis de la reprise d'Hamlet. Il va sans dire que sa présence à la répétition générale de samedi et à la représentation de mardi est de pure invention. Si Mdme Nilsson avait pu répéter samedi, elle eût chanté le mardi 5 Janvier,—ayant fait un sacrifice de cent mille francs et plus pour avoir cet honneur. Mais le docteur Jules Guérin a déclaré qu'il ne pouvait même pas répondre qu'elle pût chanter de toute la semaine,—ce qui a décidé M. Halanzier à ouvrir quand même.

OCCASIONAL NOTES.

Mr S. Arthur Chappell has accepted the post of honorary treasurer to the new Musical Association. The right man in the right place.

A special service was held in Ely Cathedral on the 6th inst., on the occasion of the Feast of the Epiphany, with the sanction of the Bishop, Dean, and Chapter, and, as a most interesting feature of the service, Mendelssohn's "Lauda Sion" was given by the Ely Musical Society with orchestral accompaniments. The chorus and instruments were derived from purely local sources. A very large congregation attended. The society, which numbers over 230 members, was founded in November last by Dr Edmond Chipp, well-known in the musical world, who holds the office of organist of the Cathedral; and it was only through his gratuitous and energetic efforts that the society was able, at such an early period, to perform creditably a musical work of the above character.

Ballad Concerts.—On former occasions, when noticing these concerts, we have thought it requisite to assert their raison d'être and to protest against the sneers of which they are sometimes made the object by persons whose desire to get credit for exalted tastes passes the bounds of discretion. Now, however, there is no need for such championship. Mr Boosey's enterprise has entered upon its ninth year, and the ballad concert holds a legitimate place among entertainments, because, while adapted to please the greatest number, it is, when properly conducted, certain to exercise a beneficial influence. The series which began in St James's Hall last Saturday afternoon will, if we may judge by the artists engaged and the songs presented on the opening occasion, take the highest possible rank. In point of fact, Mr Boosey need only sustain the excellence of these concerts in order to secure all the success that those can desire for him who properly estimate the spirit he has shown through eight years of varied experiences.

Kidderminster, the parish of Baxter, was once represented by Mr Lowe, and now contains an inhabitant who, if not already known to fame, deserves to be so. The Town Council of Worcester, who petitioned the Queen to "use her influence" to have the Worcester Cathedral still used for musical festivals, invited Kidderminster to join in the work. The Mayor, with a delicate sense of variety in language, moved that the Queen be petitioned not "to use her influence," but to "intervene." "Intervening" is a process connected not so much with the Queen, as with the Queen's proctor; but it is as much to the purpose as "using influence." "Councillor Crowther opposed petitioning the Queen to do what she had no power to do, and moved an amendment. It would be an idle ceremony, and, whatever Worcester might do, it was undesirable for them to appeal to the Queen. The object was not to be attained in that way. The Queen would only use her influence through her Ministers, and it was not expected in this instance." The last sentence sounds as if it were due to the reporter rather than to the speaker, but it is comforting to know that Kidderminster contains one councillor who has learned to "honour and obey the Queen," and knows that to put her in an undignified position is no honour.

CONCERTS VARIOUS.

At Mr Aguilar's performance of pianoforte music at his residence, 17, Gloucester Crescent, Hyde Park, on Monday, January 4th, there was a very large attendance. The programme was as follows:—Sonata, Op. 2, No. 1, Beethoven; "Le Desir" (transcription), Aguilar; Allegro de Concert, Chopin; Nachtstück and Novellette (in F), Schumann; Prelude and Fugue in B flat, Bach; Sonata in D, Aguilar; Lieder ohne Worte, Mendelssohn; "Chi mi frena" (transcription), Aguilar; "Ave Maria," Arcadelt, and "Erl König," Schubert (transcriptions), Liszt; "Evening" (romance) and "Esmeralda" (morceau caractéristique"), Aguilar.

Mr W. H. Holmes' Pianoforte Recital.—The accomplished pianist, Mr W. H. Holmes, gave (by kind permission) a "Recital" on Tuesday, at 26, Portland Place, before a numerous and fashionable audience. Mr Holmes was supported by excellent artists and clever amateurs. The concert-giver's reading and execution of Beethoven's "Sonata with Funeral March"—one of his most grandly conceived pianoforte works—were faultless. His performance of the fantasia on Les Huguenots was brilliant, and gave entire satisfaction to the admirer's of Thalberg's music. Mr Frank Holmes gave, with effect, Sir J. Benedict's fine aria, "Rage, thou angry storm" (The Gipsy's Warning), and sang in the second part a very charming new song, "Memories, sweet and sad," composed by Mr W. H. Holmes, to some beautiful words by Mrs Baines. Mr Lazarus, the veteran clarionetist, played, with Mr Holmes, a duet by Weber, and, in the second part, an Adagio by Spohr, displaying all the sweetness of tone and brilliancy of execution which have always distinguished him. Mr T. Harper played a trumpet solo excellently (a novelty in a drawing-room). A young singer, Miss Harriet Harper, a daughter of Mr Charles Harper, made on this occasion her first appearance in public, and sang (accompanied by her professional master, Mr H. Kingsbury), Gounod's "Maid of Athens," and Mr J. L. Hatton's "A bird sang in a hawthorn tree," in both of which the youthful artist made a favourable impression. The concert-giver played, also, a gavotte by Mr Edward Land; Liszt's "Gnomen-Reigen," Dr Hans von Bülow's "Canzonnettura," his own romance, "The sighing wind," and a melody from his opera, The Elfin of the Lake. An interesting feature in the programme was an "Incidental Overture," originally composed for full orchestra, by Mr Herbert Baines. The work is remarkable for the clever treatment of its subjects, showing the hand and mind of an educated and talented musician. From the hands of Mr W. H. Holmes Mr Baines' composition received ample justice, and he produced the greatest effect that could be obtained from a pianoforte "transcription" of an orchestral work. The audience was very appreciative, and specially applauded Mr Baines' overture, and Mr Holmes' performance. Mr Holmes announces that performances by his professional pianoforte pupils will take place, on April 30th, in St James's Hall, (under the immediate patronage of their Royal Highnesses the Duke and Duchess of Edinburgh) with the assistance of eminent professors. Some rarely heard compositions of Bach's, including his concerto for four pianofortes, are to be given on the occasion, under the direction of Mr Henry Holmes.—Sigmund Menkes.

Royal Academy of Music.—In consequence of the great increase in the number of students at this Institution, all the Public Concerts of the Royal Academy, during the ensuing year, will take place at the St James's Hall.

The first of the new series of the Royal Albert Hall Concerts will take place on Thursday next, the 21st instant, when Herr Wilhelmj, who has the reputation on the Continent of being one of the greatest of living violinists, will make his first appearance, after several years' absence from England. Madlle Johanna Levier and Mr Sims Reeves, now thoroughly recovered from his late indisposition, are also announced. The band has been considerably increased and strengthened by the engagement of Messrs James Howell, J. Reynolds, Lazarus, Zerbini, Burnett, and others among the best London instrumentalists. The concert will be under the direction of Mr Barnby.

Parma.—The Cavaliere Lauro Rossi's Contessa di Mons has proved tolerably successful at the Teatro Regio, though by no means unexceptionably performed. It did not go off particularly well the first night, but told better the second, when the composer was called on some twenty times.

Social Intercourse.

(From "Another World.")

"The contact of society is necessary for the nurture and the preservation of the generous feelings implanted in us by the Great Spirit."

Both he and his supposed "enemy" were present at a dinner given by a high official, the chief Knowledge-tester or Examiner. Our dining-tables are semi-circular and the guests are seated on the convex side only. The Monomaniac, being a particular friend, honoured by the host, sat next to him in the centre. The supposed "enemy" happened to be seated at the extreme end of the semi-circle, and consequently in a position to be seen from the centre of the table. All went on well till about the middle of the repast, when suddenly the Monomaniac rose, pointed to his supposed enemy, and addressing himself to the guests, said, "Look there! Do you not see the grimaces he is making at me?"

Every one marvelled! The host addressed the Monomaniac in a gentle tone, entreating him to have more control over his temper. Those seated close to the supposed "enemy" declared loudly that he had made no grimaces; but their denial only increased the fury of the accuser. A bird—considered a great delicacy—had just been placed before the host. It was arranged, as were our dishes generally, to please the eye as well as the palate, being ornamented with olives, sweetmeats, and other ingredients of varied colours. Birds, I may incidentally remark, are cooked without the bones; these are skilfully taken out and serve to enrich the gravy.

The Monomaniac again rose suddenly, and, before his arm could be arrested, seized the fowl, larded as it was with accessories and dripping with gravy, and with all his force hurled it whole, with unerring aim, at the face of the supposed enemy. So great was his excitement, and so rapid his movements, that he had seized one of the "knife-spoons," and had he not been arrested, would probably have hurled that, and, indeed everything within reach, against the object of his fury.

At private dinners the number of guests never exceeds twelve, and at the back of each, corresponding to every seat, is a small closet, ordinarily used by each guest for his ablutions. Into one of these the Monomaniac was placed with considerable difficulty, everything with which he could injure himself having been previously removed. By the doctor's order he was treated as a patient, and, after some time, the result of the application of the tests, then only recently discovered, showed that he was much affected with brain animalcula, which had been generated by the exhaustion of one part of the brain, in consequence of the incessant occupation of another portion by one all-engrossing subject, without the relief of sufficient air, recreation, and bodily exercise.

The "supposed enemy" and the Monomaniac had been both occupied on the same subject; the latter was much superior, and consequently attained greater distinction. Notwithstanding this, he was fearful that the "enemy" would ultimately excel him.

At the end of a few months the Monomaniac was completely cured. It was not, however, until after a year's travel and change of scene that he was allowed to resume his old studies. He now became more brilliant than ever, and we were indebted to him for some valuable discoveries. He had learned that his supposed enemy was a real friend and true admirer of his great talents. He never suffered again from the affliction, which, had it not been arrested in time, would have ended in confirmed madness. He became more than ever a strong advocate for the observance of my laws in favour of recreation.

PROVINCIAL.

CRAWLEY, SUSSEX.—Mdlle Teresa Bonini (of Brighton) gave a morning and evening concert in the George Hotel Assembly Rooms, on the 30th ult., which attracted a full and fashionable assemblage of her friends and pupils in this locale. Mdlle Bonini sang (and accompanied herself on the harp), "Ye banks and braes," Benedict's "By the sad sea waves," and the favourite melody of "The Swiss Boy," in each of which she was encored. Mdlle Teresa Bonini was assisted, as vocalists, by Mdme Cassinello, M. Bataille, a select choir, and by Mdlle F. Pieczonka, a pianist of merit. Several vocal solos and concerted pieces by Mozart, Bishop, G. B. Allen, Meyerbeer and Wallace, were given with more or less effect. The concert was a success.

ALFORD (Lincolnshire).—The much esteemed organist, Mr Henry Brown, gave his annual concert, and on this occasion introduced his daughter, Miss Jenny Brown, pupil of Herr Wollf of Bradford, and lately of Mr Walter Macfarren. The young pianist showed decided talent and knowledge as a pianist, playing in first-rate style some piano pieces of Chopin, Hiller, Macfarren, besides the two trios of Mendelssohn and Beethoven, and proved herself a thorough musician. Mr Brown secured the services of some London artists—Miss Jessie Giles and Mr Stedman, vocalists; M. Albert, violoncello; Herr Rosenthal, violin; and Herr Lehmeyer as conductor. The concert was repeated with success the following day at Louth.—(From a correspondent).

WOLVERHAMPTON.—We take the subjoined from the Midland Counties Herald:—

"The third of the excellent 'Hayward Concerts' came off at the Athenæum Rooms, Queen Street, on Tuesday night. The instrumental performers were Miss Muntz, first violinist (pupil of M. Sainton); Mr H. Hayward, second violin; Mr Roberts, tenor; Mr Owen, violoncello; Miss Clara Muntz, solo pianist; and Mr Arcott, accompanist. The opening piece of the programme was Mendelssohn's Quartet in D, Op. 44, No. 3, for strings. The lion's share of the fiddling fell to Miss Muntz, and she performed the really arduous duties entailed upon her by the opening movement as though she did not know what fatigue was. Her musical rendering is almost faultless, and her execution vigorous and rapid. Rheinberger's Quartet in E flat, Op. 83, was the only other considerable concerted piece, if we except Spohr's beautiful Duet for violins (Op. 88), which was most excellently performed by Miss Muntz and Mr Hayward, the violins keeping time like two voices. The piano was played by Miss Clara Muntz, who made also a most legitimate impression by her fine rendering of one of Chopin's mazurkas. Miss Muntz's violin solo was not of great beauty, but it served to display her powers of execution to advantage."

TORQUAY.—Mdme Campobello-Sinico's concert-party gave a grand morning concert at the Bath Saloon, on Monday, the 11th inst. The rooms were crowded by a most fashionable audience, and the concert altogether was in every way excellent. That it was appreciated, the enthusiastic applause obtained by each artist, after their exquisite performances, fully proved. The programme consisted of a capital selection from Balfe's Il Talismano, which pleased greatly; Campana's "The First Rose," for which Mdme Campobello received an encore, when, to the delight of all present, she gave "Home, sweet home," with exquisite taste. "O mon fils," from the Prophète, was given by Mdme Stella Bonheur with dramatic power, and the clever contralto was encored in "Il segreto," from Lucrezia Borgia. Sig. Campobello, whose fine voice was the theme of general admiration, sang, besides the pieces allotted to him in Il Talismano, Handel's "Honour and Arms," a song by Signor Odoardo Barri, and "The Hour of Meeting," by Campana; Signor Urio was encored in "Floweret, I kiss thee," from Il Talismano, when he gave "La Donna e mobile," with immense success; Signor Tito Mattei was encored in both his piano solos, and played two others, which were equally well received. The Cavaliero Campana accompanied all the vocal pieces with his usual taste and judgment.—The next concert in Torquay, of consequence, will be Mr Charles Oberthür's and Mr Charles Fowler's Harp and Pianoforte Recital, at the Bath Saloon, on Saturday, the 23rd inst., which, like Mdme Campobello's concert, will be under the management of Mr William Reynolds, the enterprising caterer for high-class musical performances in Torquay.

Il Guarany was played at Florence, December 26, when La Pergola reopened.

M. LAMOUREUX conducted a performance of the Messiah in the Cirque des Champs Elysées on Thursday last. The contralto was Mdme Patey.

LUBECK.—The principal feature at the third concert of the Musical Union was Herr Hoffmann's "Frithjof Symphony," to the great delight of those who admire Herr R. Wagner's imitators when they have not an opportunity of admiring Herr R. Wagner himself.

ARABELLA GODDARD IN NEW ZEALAND.

(From "The Nelson Evening Mail," November 6, 1874.)

The Provincial Hall was again filled with a delighted audience on the occasion of Mdme Goddard's last appearance in Nelson. Of Mdme Goddard's performances on the piano we cannot speak in sufficiently high terms. Her great piece last night was Beethoven's Funeral March Sonata, in which her playing was grand in the extreme. The andante was perfect in its simplicity and depth of feeling; the third variation gave the player an opportunity of displaying her wonderful elasticity of wrist and delicacy of touch. The staccato with both hands was really marvellous. But all the changes and variations that preceded it, beautiful as they were, sunk into absolute nothingness before the magnificent Funeral March. Our pen is inadequate to give the faintest idea of the way in which the great artist rendered this really sublime work. Commencing softly, solemnly, and melodiously, the March gradually works upwards in tone and expression until, under the hands of the magician who controlled it, the piano poured forth volumes of sound that might almost have been likened to those produced by a full orchestra. Then came the muffled drums, and the wailing melody dying away in the distance, and falling, as it were, to the faintest of whispers. The effect upon the audience is not easily described, and it was not dispelled until Mdme Goddard dashed into the vivacious finale, played with exquisite lightness and delicacy. Throughout the twenty minutes occupied in playing this beautiful sonata, there was a breathless silence in the crowded room, in strong contrast to which was the burst of applause that followed. The next piano selection was the "Prayer" from Rossini's Moses in Egitto. In his arrangement of this Thalberg seems to have been determined to include every imaginable difficulty, the chords sweeping from one end of the keyboard to the other, while, at the same time, through the volume of sound produced, the melody always comes out with clearness and distinction. At the conclusion of this most fatiguing piece, Mdme Goddard was so loudly applauded that she could not refuse an encore, and, with great sweetness and pathos, she played a number of the most familiar Scotch airs. The last piece in the programme was a fitting one with which to bring the concert to a close, being a fantasia introducing "Rule Britannia" and "God save the Queen," expressly composed for Mdme Goddard by Jules de Sivrai, who had evidently studied her rare gifts. In the latter air especially her playing was wonderful, there being something grand in the extreme in the crashing chords in which the old spirit-stirring tune was conveyed to the ears of the audience, who, as Mdme Goddard rose from the piano, rose also from their seats, and greeted her with three hearty cheers, while bouquets innumerable were showered upon the stage. We are glad to hear that Mdme Goddard is so delighted with the reception she has met with in Nelson, that she means, if possible, to give another concert here when on her way to Auckland.

DEEM ME NOT SAD.

(Copyright.)

Deem me not sad because I seem
Of cold and pensive mood,
Nor think me lonely when I spend
My hours in solitude.
In silent haunts as oft I stray,
With not a worldly care,
My soul is filled with blissful dreams
The thoughtless may not share.

Deem me not sad because I turn
From revel scenes away,
Who mingle in the giddy throng
Are not always the gay:
How oft in eyes which beam with light
A tear is seen to start;
A smiling lip and hollow mirth
May hide a breaking heart.

I am not sad, no, deem it not,
Tho' fortune chance to lower,
My gentle hopes, they buoy me up
Beyond the passing hour.
Then let the restless and the gay
Seek pleasure as they will;
Than all this life's unsated joys,
Sweet peace is dearer still.—ADA LESTER.

ISABELLA'S PIANO.

"Se non è vero," etc.

When Serrano was Regent of Spain, among the on dits that passed current was the following:—

Madame Serrano, as wife of the regent, occupied the apartments in the royal palace of the ex-queen, and no doubt she was well pleased with her residence, for the rooms were most luxuriantly furnished. But soon after the regent's occupancy of the palace, Isabella demanded the restitution of such of her private property as it contained, and the Spanish nation was in nowise disposed to withhold anything from her that she could justly lay claim to; all was to be forwarded to her, to the very last article.

Load after load of boxes and bales were carried to the depôt, to be forwarded to Isabella by rail, and among the articles sent there were not a few that the new occupants of the palace were sorry to be deprived of. After a time the ex-queen made a demand for several things that were wanting, especially for a piano that a musical association of which she had been the patroness had presented her with.

The instrument was very richly ornamented with gold, and bore on the front side a beautiful medallion set with diamonds. It was, said Isabella, when she left Madrid for a watering-place near the French line, in her private apartments. But Mdme Serrano knew nothing of —had not seen it—and the whole palace was ransacked for the lost piano, yet it was nowhere to be found. The dethroned queen, however, insisted that the "valued souvenir" should be restored to her. The consequence was, that the situation became embarrassing for Serrano vis-à-vis of his afore-time patroness, and all the more so as it was said that the piano was in the late queen's apartments when the Serrano family moved into them. Serrano even hunted through the palace himself for the lost instrument, and, although Mdme. Serrano assured him that it was not in her rooms, he included them in his search, being haunted by a dim recollection that he had seen it somewhere. Finally, his threats and entreaties drew from his consort the humiliating confession that she, in a momentary pecuniary embarrassment, had sold the piano. The scene that followed in the Serrano household is said to have been more animated than edifying; but the regent knew now, at least, where to look for the missing "souvenir," which was a great point gained.

He immediately sent a confidential agent to the purchaser in order to buy it back again; but—O monstrous!—the instrument had already become so demoralised, so plebeian, as to be the inmate of a coffee-house, after having been robbed of its costly ornamentation of gold and diamonds, which had been disposed of to a jeweller. What was to be done? The chronique scandaleuse of Madrid had already taken up the subject, and therefore there was no time to be lost. Serrano's agent repaired to the coffee-house, and offered double the sum for the piano that was paid for it; but the cunning landlord declared he could not do without it, and consented to part with it only when five times the sum he had paid was offered him.

Now the jeweller was hunted up, and he was found to have as sharp an eye to business as the coffee-house man. He expressed a thousand regrets that he had already melted up the gold and disposed of the diamonds; he added, however, that it would be possible to reproduce the ornamentation even to the smallest detail, as, on account of the beauty of its design, he had made a careful sketch of it. This statement looked rather improbable; but the piano must be forthcoming, cost what it would, and that, too, exactly in its original dress, in order to avoid the threatened scandal. The jeweller's demands were acceded to, and in a remarkably short space of time the instrument, carefully packed, was returned to the palace, where it was said to have been finally discovered in an out-of-the-way corner, together with other of the ex-queen's personal belongings.

When the fearfully mistuned piano, that had cost the regent so much money, and had made him so much trouble, was finally forwarded to its owner, he felt greatly relieved. And the piano, however much out of tune it was, probably found its wonted harmony sooner than did the little domestic circle in which it had caused such unharmonious intermezzo.

MILAN.—M. Gounod's Romeo e Giulietta has more than confirmed the good impression it produced at the Scala on the first night. Signora Mariani and Sig. Bolis, as the two unhappy lovers, fully sustain their previous reputation. Gustavo Wasa, by Sig. Marchetti, and Le Prophète, by Meyerbeer, are in rehearsal; so is the ballet of Pietro Mica, to replace, as quickly as possible, that of Giulio Cesare, which is an utter failure.—La Forza del Destino has proved exceedingly attractive at the Teatro Carcano. Herr von Flotow's Martha, also, has been successful at the same establishment, though not in such a high degree. The part of the heroine is well sustained by Signora Chiomi, an Englishwoman. Sig. Armandi-Villa, the tenor, and Sig Moragas, the baritone, acquit themselves creditably of what they have to do.

HAMLET.

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

SIR,—The sensitive and delicately constructed mind of Hamlet, apparent at the outset of the play, and a strangeness in speech scarcely consistent with mental health, as, first, in his reply to the King, and immediately afterwards, to his mother, suggest whether he is perfectly sane when we first see him. His first soliloquy shows him contemplating suicide, but his lack of courage befriends him. Perhaps the two events—his father's sudden death, and his mother's unnatural conduct shook his reason. His subsequent intention to assume madness will hardly be disputed by any person who has studiously addressed himself to the right comprehension of the character. How far this intention indicates a tendency to madness is worthy of thought. And would not the assumption of madness unhinge the mind? While it is true that those who fear madness are the least susceptible of it, those on the other hand feeling sure of their minds and feigning insanity are likely to have their reason shaken. The qualities of a mind, sane or not, are more or less reflective, and most minds have a disposition to imitate. From one of these causes it may be that at times keepers at asylums become insane, and are received as patients. When they recover they resume their position as keepers.

Hamlet is awe-struck on seeing the Ghost. On such a mind as his what must have been the effect of the Ghost's communication? His address to the Stars, to the Earth, and even to Hell, shows it. He wishes everything to be removed from his memory, but the command of the Ghost,—revenge. The haste with which he is about to disclose to Horatio and Marcellus the Ghost's communication, and then his very abrupt withholding of it are further indications of an unsettled mind. He does not wish it to be known that the Ghost has appeared, and, accordingly, he asks Horatio and Marcellus to swear that they will not reveal anything of the circumstance. This is followed by the Ghost from beneath saying, "swear," and afterwards, "swear by his sword;" or by Hamlet's imagining that the Ghost has spoken, as there is no reason to think that Horatio and Marcellus heard the voice. Hamlet's remark here would make it appear that the character had on a sudden become that of a low comedian. His reverence for the Ghost and its story is gone, and he makes a joke of it. If this scene shows not Hamlet insane, it presents us with the phase of a character that is inexplicable. Next comes his admitted assumption of insanity:—

> "As I, perchance, hereafter shall think meet
> To put an antic disposition on."

Presently he asserts that he knows a "hawk from a hand-saw" (which a really sane man would not attempt to make as a proof of sanity); add to this the fact that all take him for mad, which alone would be likely to bring about an unsettled state of intellect—just as a healthy man has been known to be brought to the grave, from a conspiracy among his friends to declare to him that he looked very ill whenever they met him, in opposition to his own assertion that he was in perfect health. Hamlet's vacillation, never once being able to complete the carrying out of an intention of an important thing, proves that what Lady Macbeth said of her husband, should be affirmed of this prince—that he was "infirm of purpose." He tries the "play" to satisfy himself that he has not been deceived by the Ghost, whom his sad state of mind begins to picture as the devil come to him in his late father's form to lure him on to his own destruction. Though the "play" was perfectly satisfactory in establishing the guilt of his uncle, inasmuch as it had caught the conscience of the King, yet Hamlet takes no revenge. Again, his not killing his uncle on his knees at the altar, when so favourable an opportunity presented itself of obeying the command of the Ghost, betrayed that infirmity of purpose. His suggestion to himself to wait for more complete revenge was a paltry excuse, and not such as a sane man desiring revenge would have conceived, in the face of a "golden opportunity." Come we now to the closet scene with his mother, where, in his diseased imagination, he sees his father's Ghost, and speaks to it. This Ghost had no real existence, or his mother, following Hamlet's eyes, would have seen it. She taxes him with fixing his eyes upon vacancy. This then was a Ghost of Hamlet's brain, and not the one that was seen in the first act by Horatio and Marcellus. It was like the ghost of Banquo, which Macbeth's fevered imagination conjured up; for to the eyes of the Scottish tyrant it was sitting upon the very chair which was vacant, and in which the King was asked to sit. The foregoing considerations, together with the general conduct of Hamlet, prior to his return to Denmark in time to witness the funeral of Ophelia, are offered as containing proof that up to this period at least, but not beyond it, the madness believed in by some and altogether denied by other Shakespearian students, was real, and confirmed in the assumption. I am, Sir, yours obediently,

F. E. PENNA.

Christmas Day, 1874.

Will our correspondent enlighten us as to the fact whether Rosencrantz and Guildenstern were mad also, seeing that, as they played into Hamlet's hands, and were executed in his stead, they must have had less "method in their madness" than had Hamlet who was the intended victim.—A. S. S.

MUSIC IN MANCHESTER.

To support the opinion that Mr Hallé's concert last week was one of the most delightful ever given in Manchester, I need only say, in giving you the programme, that the most exacting critic would have been satisfied with the performance of every piece.

Overture, "Lodoiska" (first time)—Cherubini; Air, "Honour and Arms" (Samson) (Mr Santley)—Handel; Solo Violin, Fantasia on Austrian Melodies (Herr Straus)—Molique; Romanza, "Donna gentil" (Mercante di Venezia) (Mr Santley)—Pinsuti; Grand Symphony, No. 4, in B flat—Beethoven; Introduction to Lohengrin—Wagner; Grand Sonata, Pianoforte, in E flat, Op. 29, No. 3 (Mr Charles Hallé)—Beethoven; Songs, "Thy lovely face," "Devotion" (Mr Santley)—Schumann; Pageant March, "La Reine de Saba"—Gounod.

And a programme like this a Manchester audience can really enjoy—the Beethoven symphonies are all well known here, and Mr Hallé has done nearly as much to make us familiar with the sonatas as with the grand orchestral works of the greatest of all composers. It is very easy to distinguish when an audience is unaffectedly delighted—in Manchester we always behave properly, in the Hall at least we do,—we may not always be equal to the due appreciation of everything we hear, but we know, at any-rate, what we ought to enjoy, and you would admire our attention to works, the merits of which we admit on trust. It is not pleasant to be considered wanting in just discrimination, and a hitherto unheard work by a modern German composer is now certain to be listened to with respectful attention; but how different is the reception of such a symphony as Beethoven's magnificent No. 4; and I might compare the attitude of our audiences towards the modern romantic compositions for the pianoforte with the rapt attention awarded to Mr Hallé's performance of the sonata—but I daresay you can very well imagine the difference.

Mr Santley was in very fine voice, and sang superbly. Herr Straus, who shares the leadership of the band with Mr Seymour, is a great favourite here, and played, as he always does, with consummate skill.

The programme for Mr Hallè's concert this week is not less attractive:—

PART I.—Overture, Hamlet—Gade; Air, "Rest in the Lord" (Miss Antoinette Sterling)—Mendelssohn; Grand Septett—Violin, Viola, Violoncello, Clarinet, Horn, Bassoon, and Contra-basso, in E flat, Op. 20 (first time) (performed by Mdme Norman-Neruda, Herr Straus, Sig. Piatti, Herr Grosse, M. Paquis, Sig. Raspi, and Herr Neuwirth)—Beethoven. PART II.—Concerto, Pianoforte, in A minor (Mr Charles Hallé)—Schumann; Song, "King of Thule" (Miss A. Sterling)—Liszt; Solo Violoncello, Sonata in F (first time) (Signor Piatti)—Marcello; Duet, Piano and Violin, Three "Pensées Fugitives," "Souvenir," "Intermezzo," "Adieu" (Mr Charles Hallé and Mdme Norman-Neruda)—Keller and Ernst; Song, "Lullaby" (Miss A. Sterling)—Miss Macirone; Overture, Ferdinand Cortez—Spontini.

At Mr De Jong's concert on Saturday evening a Mr Barnet McGuckin, a young Dublin tenor, sang for the first time in Manchester, and made a very favourable impression. His voice is of pure and beautiful quality, and he uses it with so much skill and taste that it is difficult to suppose he is a novice. I shall be surprised if Mr McGuckin does not secure a very good position.

BRUITS DE COULISSES.

L'indisposition de Mdme Nilsson continue, mais toutefois sans inspirer d'inquiétudes sérieuses. Tout au contraire un mieux sensible se serait déjà déclare dans l'état de l'illustre malade sans la surexcitation nerveuse causée par la contrariété qu'elle éprouve de ne pouvoir remplir ses engagements.

On a répandu à ce sujet des bruits inexacts; entre autres celui-ci: que Mdme Nilsson assistait à la représentation d'inauguration. Est-il besoin de dire qu'il n'en est rien?

La vérité c'est que depuis huit jours Mdme Nilsson n'a pas un seul instant quitté sa chambre et qu'elle aspire avec une impatience fébrile, bien facile à comprendre, au moment où il lui sera permis de reparaître devant ce public parisien que a fait sa réputation.

Quant aux personnes qui pourraient croire à une maladie simulée, ce qui, par parenthèse, n'aurait aucune raison d'être, nous leur rappellerons le certificat de M. le docteur Jules Guérin, certificat reproduit par tous les journaux.

MAD. PATTI AT ST PETERSBURGH.*

The second part sung by Mad. Patti was that of Dinorah, in Le Pardon de Ploërmel. This capricious character, natural by its very artifice, is like a kaleidoscope exhibiting the most contrary emotions of the soul, skirting the track of reason and the abyss of madness. Surrounded by the greatest perils for anyone else, it is for Mad. Patti the occasion of a triumph, which comes as naturally to her as if it were the simplest matter of course. She did not always sing well in the final trio of the third act ("Il tintinnar"), but at present she forms from it, so to speak, a new world of music. She is now quite at home in it, and not only a visitor, as she formerly was. One great thing in her favour is her extreme accuracy as regards measure and rhythm. This is so great that the orchestra has never to yield to her. A double-bass player said to us the other evening, "Mad. Patti is herself the music she sings; this is why she never makes a mistake in measure or movement." Double-bass players know what they are talking about. But the most surprising part of her talent is her facility, which is always without effort, and never needs to wait for the right moment. Her voice takes a note, however high, even though it be detached, just as anyone would take a note on the piano. This infallible voice goes off at the beginning of a scale like a steel spring, and rises quietly, and sure of itself, to the most giddy registers, doing absolutely whatever it likes as it proceeds. The farther one interval lies from another, the more dangerous it is for the voice to take. Now, in his last variation of the "Shadow Dance," Meyerbeer proceeds by nothing less than sixths (six intervals). It is forked lightning in notes. At this passage a thunder of applause answers the artist, cries of "bis" re-echo through the house, and Mad. Patti re-commences her lightning. In the final scene, Dinorah salutes her companions at the wings with certain volate, in which she triumphantly sounds a high C and D flat with unheard-of force and limpidity. Her re-awakening to memory and reason is, moreover, characterised by the finest dramatic action. This splendid music of the great magician of modern opera is marvellously brilliant; its fancy is always full of intention, and profoundly dramatic. There is something truly new in every number. We must penetrate, in order to appreciate it. It is not easy; it is not self-apparent; but those who make the attempt are sure to find out its purport. It presents certain points of analogy with Weber's music. What distinguishes it from Weber's manner is the greater development of the motives. This assimilates Meyerbeer to the symphonic form, which will always be the musical form, par excellence, save certain exceptions.

Two of Rossini's best works, Carlo il Temerario (Guillaume Tell), and Zora (Mose in Egitto), have been highly successful, the honour of this being due, in the first place, to M. Maurel (Tell, Merismane), who is becoming more and more a favourite with the public.

W. DE L.

CAIRO.—Madame Bentham-Fernandez has been reaping golden laurels since her recovery from her severe indisposition, in the operas, Il Barbiere di Seviglia, and Don Pasquale. The local journals are eloquent in praise of her acting, singing, and—dressing! "In the first act Madame Fernandez wore a lovely blue silk, all trimmed with roses" (no wonder Don Pasquale was smitten). "In the second act she wore the same beautiful white dress the fair singer wore at the Viceroy's concert; and, in the third act, a white jet (whatever that may be) tunic, with a white camelia in her hair." The Viceroy, the Prince of Oldenberg, and no end of "swells" were present at the performance of Don Pasquale. Madame Fernandez was nervous, and did not sing her opening aria well, but in the duet with the barytone, she gave the two "Do's" in the cabaletta capitally, and was greatly applauded, but not so much as she deserved; at the end, however, a splendid bouquet was thrown to her. In the second act Madame Fernandez acted and sang to perfection, and, with her comrades, was enthusiastically called on at the conclusion, as well as at the end of the last act. The Viceroy was so pleased with Madame Fernandez's performance, that after the second act his Royal Highness sent for her to his box, and expressed to her the great pleasure her singing and acting had afforded him. This is considered a great honour, as Madame Fernandez is the first artist for the last two seasons the Viceroy has received in his box, every one is therefore now "cap in hand" to the admired artist.

WAIFS.

Mr Mapleson, director of Her Majesty's Opera, visited Paris for the opening of the new grand theatre.

M. Leprévost, organist of St Roch, died at Paris, Dec. 19.

There is a talk of producing Wagner's Tristan und Isolde at Vienna.

The gala opening of the Grand Opéra brought 36,282 francs into the treasury.

Leopold de Meyer has been giving very successful concerts at Bucharest.

Two biographies of Rossini are about to appear, one in Milan, the other at Bologna.

The death is announced of Signor Lucchesi, formerly well known on the Italian stage.

Schubert's Zauberhärfe has just been produced in Vienna for the first time since 1820.

A quartet class, under M. Wieniawski, has been formed at the Brussels Conservatoire.

Neither Sir Michael Costa nor Mr Gye were at Paris for the opening of the New Grand Opera.

Advertising reminds people of things they had been wanting all along, but had forgotten all about.

M. Charles Garnier, architect of the New Opera House, has been made an officer of the Legion of Honour.

Berlioz's L'Enfance du Christ was performed on Sunday last at the Châtelet concerts, under the direction of M. Colonne.

Mdlle Singelli is making a short stay in Paris, but will shortly return to England to take part in Mr Mapleson's provincial tour.

Ernani has been played in Berlin with a new dénoûment. Ernani, instead of dying, marries Elvira, with Don Carlo's consent.

The name "grass widow" is of French origin. It is derived from the French "grace," and originally meant a widow by courtesy.

A Toledo female fainted when told that over 500,000 men died last year, but was revived by the information that there were 13,000,000 left.

For gushing young maidens of thirty-five and upwards a cunning fringe of hair on the forehead, in the poodle-dog style, is the proper thing.

Mr Lennox Browne, surgeon to the Royal Society of Musicians, has been appointed also Aural Surgeon to the society in place of the late Dr Peter Allen.

Mr J. P. Clarke succeeds Mr Van Maanen as bandmaster of the Scotch Fusilier Guards, and Mr Van Maanen takes the place of Mr J. P. Clarke, as bandmaster of the Royal Irish Police Force.

The Birmingham Town Hall, in which are held the famous triennial musical festivals, seats only 2250 persons, while the projected Glasgow Concert Hall will accommodate 2920. The Liverpool Philharmonic Hall, a model in its way, holds 2400.

Official records of Custom House returns at Washington show that the total value of musical instruments exported from the United States during the year ending June 30, 1874, was $550,317. Of this, $258,176 was for pianos, and $292,151 for parlour or reed organs.

The London Glee and Madrigal Union (director, Mr Land) gave a morning and an evening concert at the Brighton Aquarium before large audiences, on the 2nd inst., with their accustomed success. Some of Sir Henry Bishop's Glees were accompanied by Mr Reynold's orchestra.

An American paper speaking of one of the classical concerts of Mr Theodore Thomas says:—"Another superb piece on the programme was the Overtura di Ballo, by Arthur Sullivan, a 'blarsted' Englishman; but he can write good music, and he can orchestrate it magnificently, too."

On Thursday evening week the Creation was performed at the Royal Albert Hall, under the direction of Mr William Carter, with Madame Lemmens Sherrington, Miss Julian, Messrs Vernon Rigby and Lewis Thomas, as solo singers. Mr Carter's choir assisted, and Mr Edwin Bending presided at the organ.

THE LONDON ACADEMY OF MUSIC.—The annual ball in aid of the Scholarship Fund is fixed for Thursday next. The long list of patronesses and stewards shows how much interest is taken in this annual musical appeal, and report says that the full number of six scholarships will be provided for by the sale of tickets.

The usual after-Christmas performance of the Creation was given by the Sacred Harmonic Society on Friday evening week, with Madame Lemmens Sherrington, Messrs Vernon Rigby and Lewis Thomas as solo vocalists, Mr Willing as organist, and Sir Michael Costa as conductor. The Hall was very full, and the performance was admirable.

Mr Francis Fairlie has secured from Messrs Cramer and Co. the sole English right of the latest of Offenbach's operas, Madame L'Archiduc, which will be produced in due course at the Globe Theatre.

A paper published not far from Utah, thus related the perplexities of a Mormon gentleman who, having married a widow and her two daughters, is trying to define his family relations:—His first wife is his mother-in-law, his step-daughters are his wives, his son by his first wife is half-brother to his other wives and a sort of uncle to his other children, etc., etc.

A few days back a daring young gentleman walked into Messrs Boosey's instrument manufactory, Great Newport Street, and decamped with two first-class bass euphoniums. Meeting one of the employés, en route, the thief coolly desired him to "get out of the way," and his desire was politely acceded to. It certainly was a bass act on the part of the young gentleman.

Another robbery of a less musical but more daring character took place on Monday morning, at the residence of Herr Maeder, South Lambeth, the musical director of Drury Lane. His gallant steed, who oft had carried him to Drury Lane, was missed from his stable, together with a new set of harness. The rage and grief of the maestro may be imagined; but, to console him, the police, we hear, have some clue to the thieves.

Two of the best played rôles in the pantomime of Dick Whittington and his Cat, now being given nightly at the Norwich Theatre, are those entrusted to Miss Phillis Moore and Miss Maggie Gardiner, who not only appear conspicuously in the burlesque opening, but subsequently do arduous work in the harlequinaide, as columbine and harlequin à la Watteau respectively.—S. W. S.

Madame Rudersdorff has written a letter to the Times wherein she gives the reasons why so few people ever excel as professional vocalists. Our (Arcadian) space does not permit of our reproducing more than a short extract, but that is one of great importance, relating to the extent which our pronunciation of English, and especially that accent common in the New England States, militate against the production of pure musical sound. She writes: "You (who study in the right school) will bring round the day when the 'good Lord' will be no more your 'gut Loawd;' when your 'heart' will be such, and not your 'haat;' when 'kindness' will cease to be 'keeindness,' and 'shall' will no longer be 'sheall.' All this, I beg to state, I hear in one of our first churches Sunday after Sunday. I also hear, 'And Gawd sed, let theaw eawth bwing foawth frutt.' This was sung by an American, not a Chinese. I also heard a tenorino frantically cry out for 'Marther! Marther!'"

At a meeting of the Hereford Town Council, on Tuesday, the following resolutions were, upon the motion of the Mayor, Mr Orlando Shelland, unanimously agreed to:—"(1) That this Council learns with very great regret that the Dean and Chapter had arrived at such a decision with regard to the Musical Festivals as will lead to their not being continued in the city of Worcester in the manner in which they have for so long a time been held, and the discontinuance of the use of the Cathedral for the purposes of which will, in the opinion of the Council, result not only in a local, but also in a great national loss. (2) That this Council heartily approve of the steps taken by the Council of the city of Worcester to maintain the continuance of the festivals in the manner in which they have hitherto been carried on; but this Council do not feel justified in memorializing her Majesty the Queen on the subject. (3) That it is a source of great satisfaction to this Council to know that the Dean and Chapter of the Cathedral Church of Hereford do not concur in the decision arrived at by the Dean and Chapter of Worcester, but are strongly in favour of the Triennial Musical Festivals being continued as heretofore."—Malvern News.

The Lauda Sion, of Mendelssohn, was composed for the Church of St Martin, at Liege, where it was first performed on June 11, 1846, being the Festival of Corpus Christi, in the Ritual for which day the Hymn is contained. The institution of this Festival had its origin in the city of Liege in the following manner:—In the early part of the 13th century, a young girl of 16 years of age, by name Juliana of Mount Cornillon, an inmate of a religious house in Liege, being strongly impressed with the necessity for the appointment of a special festival in honour of the holy Eucharist, interested in her favour several of the dignified Clergy (amongst others, James Pantaleon, Archdeacon of Liege,) who exerted their influence with the Court of Rome, to promote the attainment of her object. Juliana died without seeing her wishes fulfilled, but her design continued to be prosecuted by a female friend, who was an inmate of the house of St Martin in Liege. Ultimately the Archdeacon of Liege, who had become Patriarch of Jerusalem, was raised to the Papal Chair, under the title of Urban IV., when he issued to the friend of Juliana, a Brief, dated from Orvieto, September 8, 1264, instituting the Festival. The office for the day, the outline of which had been sketched by Juliana was composed by St Thomas Aquinas.

Madame Christine Nilsson will not go to Vienna this year, but will go in 1876. Meanwhile there is some talk of her paying a visit to the South of France.

One of Alfred Mellon's Last Addresses to the Public.—"Ladies and Gentlemen,—Having arrived at the 96th and last night of my present series of concerts, I embrace the opportunity of thanking you and the public generally for the liberal support and patronage with which I have been honoured. Your continued kindness has induced and emboldened me to undertake the production of a new grand Christmas pantomime in this theatre, which I trust will be found to equal, if not surpass, in splendour and magnificence the famed productions of past seasons. No effort of mine will be wanting to enhance the reputation this theatre enjoys for such a class of performance; and I hope that, should I succeed in producing the usual Christmas entertainment to your satisfaction, you will extend to me that favour I have hitherto been honoured in receiving. In acknowledging the kind and generous support I have for many years received at your hands, and by which I have been enabled at my sole risk and personal responsibility to carry on the concerts for the past six years, I trust I may be permitted to solicit an extension of your kind patronage to my new venture in theatrical management. Permit me, then, most respectfully to bid you farewell, and to indulge the hope that I may anticipate the pleasure of a renewal of our acquaintance on Boxing-night, December 26th."—Annals of Covent Garden.

THE VOICE & SINGING
BY
ADOLFO FERRARI.
THE FORMATION AND CULTIVATION OF THE VOICE FOR SINGING.

Price 12s.

London: Duncan Davison & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

"The remarkable qualities of this book are the author's freedom from conventional trammels, the strong sense of his opinions, and the novelty yet evident soundness of his precepts; his work has consequently come into general use as a manual of vocal instruction."—Daily News.

DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE,
For invigorating and enriching the voice, and removing affections of the throat.

DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE is universally acknowledged to be the most valuable remedy for sore throat, hoarseness and relaxed throat. It should always be taken before singing or reciting, as it strengthens the vocal organs. It is most extensively prescribed by the faculty for the throat and voice. Dr Lewis of Basingstoke says he finds them most efficacious, and in Dr Copland's Dictionary of Practical Medicine (Longman & Co.), they are strongly recommended at pages 872 and 1492. They are used by all the greatest vocalists and orators in Europe, and have been established over a quarter of a century. Testimonials from Patti, Grisi, Lablache, Santley, &c. Sold in boxes, 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. by all Chemists throughout the United Kingdom and the Colonies.

"Mr Vernon Rigby next reappeared, and sang 'A Lover's Song,' expressly composed for him by Louis Diehl. Both the words and music of the song are simple, and they received ample justice from the singer. An encore was demanded, and Mr Rigby repeated the last verse."—Birmingham Daily Post. "We must compliment Mr Rigby on his rendering of 'A Lover's Song.' This charming melody, by Louis Diehl, is worthy of Mendelssohn himself, and Mr Rigby seemed to catch the exact feeling without overdoing it."—Manchester Evening News. Price 4s. London: DUNCAN DAVISON & CO. 244, Regent Street, W.

"HER I LOVE."
BALLAD.
By WILFORD MORGAN.
Price 4s.
London: DUNCAN DAVISON & CO., 244, Regent Street, W.

"This composition is, in all respects, worthy of its predecessor, 'My sweetheart when a boy.' It is simple in structure, and within the means of every amateur; but its music is pleasing, and thoroughly appropriate to the words. No doubt the song will soon win a share of public favour."—Musical World.

"Mr Wilford Morgan's song, 'Her I love,' will be certain to find many admirers for the musicianly instinct which pervades it, as well as for the happy manner in which the very pretty melody has been laid out for the voice."—Morning Post.

"LITTLE BIRDIE, SING TO ME."
SONG.
Words by Miss S. P. HOWELL.
Music by WILFORD MORGAN,
Price 4s.
London: DUNCAN DAVISON & CO., 244, Regent Street.

"A naïve little song for a young girl is 'Little birdie, sing to me,' composed by Wilford Morgan. There is a melodious ring in this song that will please the ear."—Graphic.

"Mr Wilford Morgan's latest production, 'Little birdie, sing to me,' apparently aims at simplicity of melody and accompaniment, and has happily hit it."—Morning Post.

"'LITTLE BIRDIE, SING TO ME.'—Mr Wilford Morgan has just published another very pleasing song under the above title. It is a very fresh, bright melody, which might almost be signed Mendelssohn; and the accompaniment, while sufficient to sustain the voice, is extremely easy."—Era.

"A charming song, full of melody and sweetness, without being difficult to singers of moderate compass."—Hornet.

"From Messrs Duncan Davison & Co. we have a song by the well-known vocalist, Mr Wilford Morgan, 'Little birdie, sing to me,' a remarkably good and characteristic setting of some pretty, simple words."—Echo.

"A tuneful and pleasing ballad for a voice of average compass, effectively harmonized, although the pianoforte accompaniment presents but very few difficulties to the performer. 'Little birdie' contains all the elements of popularity, and should eventually become as popular as the composer's 'My sweetheart when a boy.'"—Sunday Times.

CRYSTAL PALACE CONCERTS.

The Christmas vacation, sacred to pantomime, being now at an end, the Saturday concerts have been recommenced; and, to judge by the first of the new series, are likely, during their continuance, to obtain all the success they so richly deserve. A Crystal Palace concert at which no novelty of any kind was produced would be itself a novelty. The general character, however, of these concerts was fully maintained on Saturday, when a work, not absolutely new but quite unknown in England, was brought out. Dimitri Donskoi is its name; Russia, artistically and historically, is the land of its birth; Rubinstein, the celebrated pianist, is its composer, its subject is doubtless the main incident in the career of the questionable hero after whom it is called. It would be much easier to narrate the history of Dimitri Donskoi—in plain English Demetrius of the Don—than to describe M. Rubinstein's overture, which must itself be supposed to describe Demetrius's fluke-like victory over the Tartars; who, contrary to their custom, and feeling, no doubt, that their time had come and that their epoch had gone, retired without giving Demetrius the trouble to attack them, and, marching eastward, never again approached Moscow in any great force. Can all this be depicted or anyhow suggested in music? Probably not. Neither Wagner nor Berlioz, who, we take it, are Rubinstein's great gods, could do much with such a subject; unless, indeed, they condescend to treat it realistically, after the manner of the late M. Jullien, and a little after that of Meyerbeer. Even M. Hervé, by contrasting Russian airs with Tartar airs played upon Tartar instruments, and by the introduction of violent explosions, might have given some idea of a struggle between a Muscovite and more or less Christian prince on the one hand, and the Khan of the Golden Horde on the other. Such a method, however, would not be sufficiently subtle, or rather it would be far too commonplace, for a composer of such pretensions and aspirations as Rubinstein, whose fragments of melody, floating here and there in the midst of the vast orchestral whirlpool, are meant to tell, or at least to suggest, the whole story. Rubinstein's music is never remarkable for any claim of its own. But it is interesting, at intervals, as showing what the cultivation of such models as Berlioz and Wagner may lead to. It is, indeed, curious that Wagnerism should have found admirers in abundance and a certain number of adepts among the Russians, who, always ready to welcome new and strange philosophical systems, looked, perhaps, on Wagner's operatic system as a sort of "nihilism" in music. The Russian Seroff out-Wagnered Wagner; so that his most terrible work—there are five acts of it, and its subject is the massacre of the inhabitants of Pskoff by Ivan Vassilivitch I.—contains only one rhythmical melody in the form of a march, the rest consisting entirely of recitative.

Another overture in the same programme was in a very difficult style by a very different master, who happens, however, to be held in but little esteem by those whom the author of the Dimitri Donskoi overture delights to honour; we mean Mendelssohn's bright and melodious overture to the Wedding of Camacho, in many respects one of the most wonderful performances that the greatest of instrumental composers since Beethoven has left. It would be curious to know what the unmusical or only moderately musical portion of the public must think of Mendelssohn's having composed the Wedding of Camacho when he was but sixteen years of age. Very few pictures and poems of the highest merit have been produced by youths of sixteen; and some of the greatest novels have been the work of men who did not essay the art of novel-writing until they had reached or passed middle age. The statistics of literary and artistic production would probably show that the genius of poets, like that of composers and painters of essentially practical temperament, attains maturity very early, while that of authors and other inventors, who depend less on intuition than on observation and comparison, is of slower development. But whether or not there be any general rule on the subject (such as Mr Galton, if any one, ought to be able to ascertain), the early age at which Mendelssohn began to compose, and the remarkable beauty of his very first works, must always be regarded as marvels in the history of art. Mr Manns' orchestra on Saturday did full justice to the beautiful instrumental piece which has suggested these remarks. The overture to the Wedding of Camacho was most brilliantly played, and produced its usual effect upon the audience.

Mr Oscar Beringer, who has often been heard at the Crystal Palace as a soloist, and who is really master of every style, played on Saturday, with the orchestra, Schumann's Pianoforte Concerto in A—a work already known, if not familiar to, the frequenters of these concerts. Schumann's music finds constantly more and more admirers in England; but his chief hold upon our public is, we fancy, through his beautiful and often thoroughly poetical songs, and his minor pianoforte pieces, which are all full of charm. It may be true, of course, that his value is best seen in his works of larger design, such as his cantatas, his symphonies, and the pianoforte concerto which Mr Oscar Beringer played so admirably on Saturday. But it seems to us that his brilliant, quaint, and ingenious, if sometimes involved, ideas will always be more readily appreciated when presented in the form of pieces for the pianoforte alone, or of pieces for the pianoforte and voice.

After speaking of what was new and curious, what was beautiful and interesting, in the concert, we must not omit to mention that its grandest piece was Beethoven's Symphony in A (No. 7), which was executed magnificently by Mr Manns' unrivalled band, and at the end of each of the four movements enthusiastically applauded. Finally, Saturday's programme included a large number of songs, chiefly, if not exclusively, German. If at the Crystal Palace Concerts the vocal were made as great a feature as the instrumental music, the solo singers—to be on a par with the orchestral performers—would be Patti and Tietjens, Nilsson and Albani; and the price of admission would be, of necessity, raised to about a guinea. As it is, the vocal pieces are always well selected and generally well sung. The principal singer on Saturday was Mr Lloyd, who is known to be quite at home in Mr Sims Reeves' music, and who, indeed, has often delivered Mr Reeves' most celebrated airs with almost as much effect as the great tenor himself. On Saturday he was heard to great advantage in the scene from Oberon, "O 'tis a glorious night," and in two songs by Schubert, "Hark, the lark at Heaven's gate sings," and "Regret."

The concert was very fully attended, as would doubtless be the case if, instead of taking place only during certain months, these concerts were given regularly every Saturday in the year.

THE THREE CHOIRS FESTIVAL.

A meeting of the stewards of the late Gloucester Musical Festival was held in Gloucester on Friday, the 15th inst., to decide whether a third of the collections at the Festival should be given to the Worcester charity, in consequence of the determination of the Dean and Chapter of that city not to allow this year's Festival to be held in the Cathedral. Sir W. V. Guise presided. It was stated that the treasurer of the Festival had withheld the money until he had received the authority of the stewards to pay it, and merely to protect himself from any legal action. A letter from the Bishop of Worcester to the Bishop of Gloucester was read, in which his Lordship said that to his mind two considerations seemed urgently to require that the tripartite division of the collections be not departed from this year, whatever may be done in future years. Firstly, all the advertisements of the Festival announced that the collections should be for the benefit of the widows and orphans of the three dioceses, and the money was given and taken on that condition. Secondly, the Worcester choir were invited to co-operate with the other choirs on the same condition, and they were entitled to complain of a breach of engagement if the condition was not fulfilled. The Worcester Chapter were pledged to hold a Festival of some sort in 1875, and they were sanguine that they would be able to collect a considerable sum for the societies as usual. He would gladly have welcomed some modifications of the old Festival, but he saw no sufficient reason for declining to preside over the Festival of 1875. Letters were read from sixteen stewards who were unable to attend, eleven of whom were in favour of the payment of the money and five against. General regret was expressed at the action of the Dean and Chapter of Worcester; and one of the stewards, Mr Lucy, complained that they had not stated their intentions not to allow the use of the Cathedral before the Gloucester Festival was held. A resolution was unanimously passed authorizing the treasurer to pay the money. During the proceedings it was suggested that Coventry Church, which is in the Worcester diocese, would be a fitting place for the next Festival.

THE PARIS OPERA ONE HUNDRED YEARS AGO.

If the reader is desirous of knowing how the grand Opera was carried on a century ago, and what was paid there, here are some very precise details on the subject. By a resolution of the King's Council of State, the right of carrying on the Opera for twelve years was accorded to M. de Vismes, "the enjoyment of this right, during the period mentioned, not being liable to be abridged or interrupted under any pretext or in any manner whatever. The text of the resolution added:—

"It is his Majesty's will that the interest on the 500,000 francs to be deposited as security by M. de Vismes shall be paid him annually by the Receiver of the City of Paris, at the rate of five per cent., without any kind of deduction. His Majesty reserves for himself the power of subsequently enacting what regulations may be deemed advisable for the police and discipline of the theatre."

The Opéra, or Académie Royale de Musique, had an Administrator-General, M. Berton, Superintendent of the King's Music, who occupied lodgings in the Operahouse itself, Rue St Nicaise, and a Director's Assistant, M. Granier, who also resided there. The company comprised: eight basses; five counter-tenors; seventeen actresses of parts, as the lady singers were then called; five actresses, to double parts and to sing in the chorus; and the chorus singers, thirty men and fifteen women, besides five supernumerary young ladies. So much for the vocal department.

For dancing there were: a composer and master of the ballets; two assistants with right of reversion to the office; three solo dancers (the first of whom was Vestris); six solo dancers and doubles (among them being Vestris, junr); six doubles and figurants; four solo female dancers; five solo female dancers who were also doubles; five female doubles and figurants; and thirty male with as many female figurants, for the corps de ballet.

The orchestra consisted of a master of music (conductor); a first accompanying flute; six basses of the small chorus; thirty violins; seven basses of the grand chorus; five double basses; five altos or quints; seven flutes and hautboys; seven bassoons; two French horns; three trumpets; two clarionets, one tambourine; and two kettle-drummers. Lastly, the guard was composed of sixty men of the regiment of Gardes Françaises, including two serjeants and four corporals. On ball nights it was augmented by forty men. Those artists who, after belonging fifteen years to the Opera, were, from age or infirmity, unable to discharge their duties any longer, received a pension in proportion to their salary, "which salary," it is artlessly or maliciously added in the text, "was in proportion to their talent." A paragraph consecrated to the Académie de Danse is by no means uninteresting. We here append it:—

"Independently of the Académie Royale de Musique, there is an Académie de Danse, which holds its meetings at the Director's. It was established by Louis XIV. in 1661, by virtue of letters patent, verified by Parliament, in 1662. The number of academicians" (members) "was fixed at thirteen, and they, as well as their children, enjoy the privilege of teaching the art of dancing without Letters, together with the right of committimus and others, belonging to such officers of the King's Household as were admitted to the King's table. They are bound to meet once a month to deliberate on what concerns their art. One of the principal objects of the Academy is to form dancers for the Opera."

The following are the works given in 1774, the year that Louis, sixteenth of the name, ascended the throne of France and Navarre: Ayolan, an heroic ballet in three acts, by Lemonnier and Floquet. Iphigénie en Aulide, a tragedy by Racine, arranged as an opera by de Rolley, with music by Gluck. Orphée et Eurydice, an heroic drama, translated from the Italian by Moline, with music by Gluck. This is all! It is true that two new grand operas (by Gluck) and a ballet, likewise new, form a pretty good contingent for a year. We have not so many now-a-days, and, above all, we have not in the same year two operas of the calibre of Iphigénie and Orphée. We must add that, after Orphée, there was performed Alain et Rosette, a little interlude by authors not much known. The public appear not to have disapproved of this innovation introduced at the Académie Royale de Musique, and copied from the practice of other theatres, where a short piece followed a long one.

"However," observes the editor of an almanack of the period, "we do not think that a lyric tragedy should be followed by one of those low comedy operas, which, once given on the stage of a fair, amused the populace, and now, decorated with a more becoming title, always remind a delicately minded man of the weakness of their origin. But why should we not see, after the lamentations of Orpheus, a pastoral, which, by its simple and natural strains, would please the ear, would touch without alarming, and deliciously charm without exciting noisy mirth?"

A pastoral with simple and natural strains! How does this remind us of 1774!—In looking through the Gazettes and almanacks of the period, we come across singular remarks on the works then given at the Opera. We know, for instance, that the poem of Armide is one of those which Lully treated most happily. Revived on several occasions, and more particularly in 1664, it always achieved a very great success.

"We still recollect," says the Calendrier des Spectacles, "the charm of the fine declamation and of the agreeable and voluptuous melodies with which Lully enhanced Quinault's enchanting poetry."

Further on, when speaking of Gluck, the same critic adds:—

"The Chevalier Gluck has followed an altogether different plan. He has given us dramatic music in which he has shown himself the same as in the operas of Orphée and Iphigénie." (Gluck wrote Armide in 1776, and had it played in 1777.) "We have the same energy of style, the same art in the distribution of the instruments, and the same harmonic science. But, as the situations in the opera of Armide are not as favourable as his other operas to his style or to theatrical declamation, the sensations he has produced appear less vivid and less strong."

As we see, the writer respects the work and the musician. This was not the case with certain harsh and violent critics. The very earliest performances of Gluck's Armide were greeted by epigrams and songs. There was one especially which so exasperated the Gluckists that they felt inclined to make its writter smart for it. It begins thus:—

"Je fais, Monsieur, beaucoup de cas
De votre science infinie,
Que, malgré votre modestie,
Vous étalez avec fracas,
Sur le genre de l'harmonie
Qui convient à nos opéras,
Mais tout cela n'empêche pas
Que votre Armide ne m'ennuie."

The same thing has been said and pretty nearly the same songs have been written of every innovator who has succeeded Gluck. But here is something else taken from one of the calendars of the period. It concerns Orphée and Iphigénie, given, as we have said above, in 1774, a hundred years ago:—

"As soon as ever M. Rousseau heard the opera of Iphigénie, he acknowledged that M. Gluck had upset his theory and changed all his ideas, and that this genius had just done something he had not thought possible. He has not taken a pride in that obstinacy of the brain which makes pleasure yield to opinion, and the movements of the soul to the combinations of the mind. Everyone knows that he missed scarcely a single performance of Iphigénie, and that he never ceased studying M. Gluck's scores. He has written on one passage in Orphée a learned letter, and commenced a continuous analysis of Alceste."

It was not long before all the large cities abroad, where grand music was appreciated, asked for Gluck's Orphée. This is sufficiently proved by the following short anecdote to be found in the Almanack de 1778:—

"A nobleman, as celebrated for his good taste and predilection for Italian music as for the charms of his mind, begged the Prince d'Ardore, a great connoisseur and himself a composer, to send him the musical work which enjoyed the highest reputation in Naples. The Italian prince sent him M. Gluck's Orphée."

We see from the preceding that the Opera was not carried on so badly even in 1774.

M. DE THÉMINES.

BRUSSELS.—Le Nozze is in rehearsal, thus cast, at the Théâtre de la Monnaie:—Figaro, M. Petit; Almaviva, M. Devoyod; the Countess, Madlle Hamaekers; Suzanne, Madlle Priola; and Chérubin, Madlle Reine.—M. Sylva, of the Opera, Paris, will shortly sing here a few times, at 800 francs a night. M. Léon Achard, also, will pay this capital a visit. He is engaged for fourteen performances, for which he will receive the sum of ten thousand francs.—Millie-Christine, the lady with two heads and two voices, one of the latter being a soprano and the other a contralto, is singing at the Alcazar. A four-act buffo opera Le Dey d'Alger, by MM. Bréhil and Roosenboom, has been accepted at this theatre.

STILL THE MESSIAH IN PARIS.*

The history of the Auditions of Sacred Harmony will, in all probability, be the same as that of the Concerts Populaires. The two enterprises had the same Unknown before them; both, conducted from the outset frankly and boldly, succeeded at once; in a little time more, the process of assimilation, as regards durable and solid success, will be complete. We shall have nothing left to desire except the opportunity of applauding Beethoven, Mozart, and Weber, Handel, Bach, and Mendelssohn, elsewhere than in a Circus. It is in vain to disguise with flowers, as on Thursday last, the vulgar features of an equestrian theatre; we shall never be able to palliate the disgrace it is for Paris, a place, after all, sincerely fond of music, not to possess a single grand concert-hall, when London boasts of three or four. Are there not in our country intelligent—I will not say: generous—capitalists?

The musical festival with which, on Thursday, the Auditions of Sacred Harmony were resumed at the Cirque, had a charitable object to which Mdme la Maréchale de Mac-Mahon, who had taken it under her patronage, contributed by her presence. It was the House of the Providence of Sainte-Marie which was destined to profit by the large returns guaranteed by an audience who had taken pretty well every seat beforehand, and by the fact that the prices of admission had been doubled for the occasion. Once more did the joyous and graceful melodies, the choruses full of grandeur and brilliancy, of The Messiah resound; once more did the public (which was not the same as before) applaud, cry bis, and acclaim the singers and the conductor. The Messiah has decidedly entered into our manners. The lively and profound impression of its early days here still subsists in its entirety; the work has forced itself on us partly by its high value and a little by right of conquest. We ought to rejoice exceedingly at this magnificent result, which, fifteen months ago, never entered the dreams even of the most sanguine. The Messiah, however, does not monopolize success. The Passion and Judas Maccabæus have already proved this, and The Creation will soon do so in its turn.

There are two new features: the interpretation and the text. The singers to whom M. Ch. Lamoureux, last winter, entrusted the solos in Handel's score, have all been replaced by others. The exigences of theatrical management will frequently impose such changes on him, so long as oratorio music has not spread here sufficiently for us to have, as they have in England, singers who devote themselves exclusively to it. Mad. Patey, whom M. Lamoureux was fortunate enough to secure, and who sang the contralto airs, is one of the artists of whom we are speaking. She sings only at concerts, more especially at concerts of sacred music and festivals, the best part of which is always reserved for some grand works of Handel, Mendelssohn, or Bach. With the tenor Sims Reeves, Miss Edith Wynne, and a few others, Mad. Patey holds the sceptre of oratorio in London, and Thursday's Audition sufficed to convince us that the great reputation she has made among her compatriots is legitimately acquired. She possesses a superb voice, though of a somewhat variable character in the higher register (a fact which was doubtless accidental, and attributable to very decided indisposition, of which the valiant artist took no notice); its sonority is ample, pure and frank in the medium, and in the lower notes. Her style, noble and broad, Mad. Patey owes as much to her own perfect musical feeling, as to tradition, which has, of course, always been permanently preserved in England. Endless bravos and recalls burst forth after the airs: "Oh, Thou that tellest!" "He was despised," and, more especially, "He shall feed His flock," which precedes the final chorus of the First Part, and which Mad. Patey finishes most charmingly. It was enthusiastically encored. After Mad. Patey, it is to Mad. Brunet-Lafleur that the largest amount of praise is due. Some of the inflexions of her charming soprano voice were exquisite in the air: "J'ai foi, Seigneur dans ta clémence." The chorus and orchestra, disciplined with the care for which M. Lamoureux is so well-known, were, under his firm and wise direction, perfect in ensemble and spirit. The celebrated: "For unto us a child is born," obtained the inevitable encore. As regards the French text, it is no longer the barbarous translation we were compelled to use for want of another; a translation in which we find such utterly ridiculous expressions and turns, without reckoning the numberless infractions against the laws of prosody, and which gives a very insufficient idea of the literary value of the work as a whole, a work more logical and better combined than people have chosen to acknowledge. M. Victor Wilder's version is correct from a linguistic point of view; it is not false to musical expression, as is frequently the case in other works; and prosody is invariably respected. More than this we cannot require.*

* This translation is not yet completed; the old words are temporarily retained for some choruses, which could not be engraved soon enough in separate parts.

The above performance of The Messiah will not be an isolated one, as might be supposed from the solemnity by which it was surrounded. A second will take place next Thursday at three o'clock, and it is probable that M. Lamoureux will not stop even there. CH. BANNELIER.

MUSIC IN MANCHESTER.

(From our Correspondent.)

A splendid performance of Beethoven's Septet, led by Mdme Norman-Neruda, and supported by Herr Straus and Signor Piatti, and a no less magnificent performance of Schumann's Pianoforte Concerto, were the most conspicuous features of Mr Hallé's concert last Thursday. Miss Sterling was the only singer, and she confirmed the favourable impression made on her previous visits. Rossini's Stabat Mater and Mendelssohn's Hymn of Praise are announced, with Mdme Lemmens-Sherrington, Miss Sterling, Mr Lloyd, and Mr Santley, as the principal singers.

At Mr De Jong's concert on Saturday, the young Dublin tenor, Mr McGuckin, again succeeded in delighting the audience, and the local papers are unanimous in their praise of the beauty of his voice and the refinement of his style. For next Saturday, Mr De Jong announces an operatic concert-party, including Mdlle Tietjens, Mdme Trebelli-Bettini, Signor Catalani, and Signor Perkins.

At the Gentlemen's Concert on Monday evening, Mdlle Tietjens sang for the first time since her recent indisposition; and though she had evidently not quite regained her accustomed strength, she sang as splendidly as ever, and roused the usually cold audience to enthusiasm. The first appearance of Mdlle Marie Krebs was, I need not tell you, very interesting to all, musicians and amateurs, and I have not often had to record a more successful first appearance. She first played Sterndale Bennett's Concerto in F minor, and at once secured the sympathy and admiration of the audience. In the second part she proved her versatility by playing, with equal success a Prelude and Fugue by Bach, a Rhapsodie by Lizst, and Schumann's exquisite Traumeswirren. We should all be glad to hear Mdlle Krebs again. Schumann's First Symphony, Beethoven's Timotheus overture, Herold's overture to Zampa, and songs by Signor Catalani, were also in the programme.

TRANSLATION OF BÉRANGER'S "QUAND TU CHANTES."

In fond arms cradled, singing
Sweet songs at evening glow;
Heart's whisper art thou hearing,
Soft answering and low?
Thy lovely song recalleth
My fairest days of yore:
Sing, sing then, my beloved,
Sing, sing for evermore.

On lip of merry laughter
Fond love doth ever play,
Fierce evil thought thereafter
Swift vanisheth away.
Ah! thine honest laughter
Shows true heart to the core:
Laugh, laugh then, my beloved,
Laugh, laugh for evermore.

Whilst calm and spotless sleeping,
In shadow 'neath mine eyes,
From murmurs of thy breathing
Sweet harmonies arise.
Thy beauteous brow revealeth
Sweet Eden, love of love:
Sleep, sleep then, my beloved,
Sleep, sleep for evermore.—G. N. G.

MADAME RUDERSDORFF ON SINGING.

(From the "New York Times," December 27, 1874.)

It is with no presumptive idea of being able to compete with the elegant style and finished writing of the authoress of "The Voice as a Source of Income," in the Galaxy, whose paper I have read with the greatest interest, that I take the liberty of sending you a sequel. It is with the desire of adding a word for the benefit of those, exclusively, with whose interests I am now so intimately associated—the young students of singing in this country. Since I have settled in Boston for the purpose of imparting my knowledge and experiences to those anxious to become singers, and since Mr John Dwight has done me the honour of citing me as "almost the only representative left of that great Italian school of dramatic singing," I have been literally overrun with pupils from almost every part of the States, and, if the limits of your excellent newspaper permit it, I would fain, through its columns, say a few words to many far away, and form a P. S. (in thorough woman's fashion) to Oliver Logan's paper, thus spreading advice which may be gladly received by many beyond the reach of verbal communication.

How many young girls in America desire to become singers is almost incredible to believe. Poor things, how often do I rack my head for gentle words to answer them! How many offer "to serve me as my maid, or do any manner of work for me, if I will only teach them." Others offer three or five years of their income. Others again, begging to be helped to a church position, to enable them to study; and more ambitious ones, hoping I can teach and also give them church engagements right away. All, however, have one and the same refrain: "Oh, Madame, if I can only become a great singer, and I know, I feel, I can, if you will only teach me!" Most of them come, and after hearing and examining them the main result for all is, without almost any exception, the same utter ignorance of everything that constitutes a singer, and the consequent necessity for long and close studies. And as I will teach no professional pupil, who is not ready to be taught and study thoroughly, I turn scores away because they came every way unprepared for a long course of studies.

Yes, most certainly; the voice is a source of income, but I would have those far away know two things: that, to get this income, they will first have to spend one, and that the ultimate incomes must be, of a necessity, of various proportions. In all vocations their great examples stand isolated—suns in a system of satellites. In the world of art and letters, such as Sophocles, Euripides, Homer, Danté, Shakespeare, Goëthe, Schiller, Bulwer, Dickens, Longfellow; Pindar, Canova, Thorwaldsen, Tiziano, Rafaele, Guido, Reni, Kaulbach, Landseer; Handel, Haydn, Beethoven, Mozart, Mendelssohn; Cafarelli, Pasta, Malibran, Lablache, Jenny Lind, Rubini, Mario, Grisi, Adelina Patti, &c., &c.; these (with many others, of course) appear as luminaries on the horizon of history. They command the attention, admiration, and imitation of their contemporaries and posterity, forming the nucleus of schools, round which aspiring neophytes eagerly gather. This is the destiny of the chosen ones; yet, let it not be assumed that it is inglorious not to be such as they were, and that, if you cannot attain the peak of the mountain, you had better not climb at all. "Aut Cæsar, aut nihil," should be the motto of the few, not of the many. The mountain side is lovely with wooded shades, scented flowers, and rippling brooks, where it is pleasant to dwell.

All the would-be singers can be divided into two principal classes: First, the few endowed by a kind nature with exceptional voices and exceptional musical talents, sometimes reaching to genius; second, those possessing good voices in quality and quantity (yet without being exceptional) and fair musical capacities. But both classes—every one individual of them—in order to succeed must be endowed with the same qualifications—application and perseverance. When in my twelfth year I studied for the first time in Paris, under Marco Bordogni, my mother took me to Lablache, that he might hear me. I asked him how I might become a great singer. He answered, "La prima qualificazioni, una bella voce, avete. Avete quattrini?" (The first qualification, a fine voice, you possess. Have you got money?) I answered in the affirmative; when he added, "Ebben, allora non avete bisogno d'altro che di perseveranza, e poi perseveranza, e poi ancora cento volte perseveranza. (Well, then, you do not want anything else but perseverance, and then again perseverance, and then again, a hundred times, perseverance.) When, sixteen years later, I sung Donna Anna to his Leporello, at the Royal Italian Opera, at Covent Garden, in London, he remembered all, and laughingly said, "Ebben, pare che l'avete avuta 'sta benedetta perseveranza." (Well, it appears that you had that blessed perseverance.)

Well, without these two qualifications, neither of the two classes will achieve anything; with them, either is entitled to the highest position attainable in each sphere, and the necessarily long time of patient, unbroken study will find its ample reward. Let none despond at the slow, often almost imperceptible progress which marks the first months of study especially, but firmly believe, if the teacher be both capable and conscientious, and the pupil docile, that as sure as the sun is shining behind the clouds, so surely must there be success in the end, success to each class according to the qualifications with which they commenced. The first to attain world-wide celebrity, and with it large fortunes. The second, if not gaining crowns, yet coronets, well worth striving for, heart and soul; an honoured name, and honourable independence, often even opulence. And you, girls, belonging to this second class, have a still higher incentive to do your work thoroughly and well; you have the glorious mission to create in your far-away homes a new, legitimate school of singing, a higher, refined taste. The way in which you have been taught to sing will swiftly tell upon your audience; every engagement in your neighbourhood will be yours; in the church you will lead your choir, and through it act upon the ear and perceptions of hundreds in more than one way, not only through the refinement of sound and taste, but also speech; and this is not the smallest item by any means. You will bring round the day when the "good Lord" will be no more your "gut Loawd;" when your "heart" will be such, and not your "haat;" when "kindness" will cease to be "keeindness," and "shall" will no more be "sheeall." All this, I beg to state, I hear in one of our first churches Sunday after Sunday. I also hear, "Ant Gawd sed, let theaw eeawth bwing foawth frutt." This was sung by an American, not a Chinese. I also heard a tenorino frantically cry out for "Marther! Marther!"

To have the power to correct all this, I call a privilege and an honour, and class two are called upon to do it, and, doing it, do endless good. That besides these two classes there are other subclasses, is, of course, unavoidable, but it is not these I would speak of or speak to. To those who, already earning honours and money, come to get the reading of a scena or an oratorio, all honour. In those, however, who, also before the public, all at once find out that they know nothing, and, frightened and frantic, rush to a great teacher to root out the mistakes committed by ignoranti, there is seldom any good. They study violently for an entire—fortnight! then come with a timid, "Oh, Madame, I forgot entirely that I had a concert, and must get up a song." And away goes scales, and a song is learned imperfectly. Then, again, scales for almost a week! Then, "Father thinks I need rest." And so on. These spasmodic students (?) do no one any good, and, when the teacher perceives the symptoms of spasms, are better left to themselves. Smallness is their alpha and omega. Let girls, before they come from a distance to spend money and time, examine themselves and find out if they have any such spasmodic tendencies. If so, let them remain at home.

One more word to all—study music, and study it earnestly. The time has gone by when it was possible for a singer not to be a musician likewise. Moreover, only to Italians can it be permitted (if permitted it can be at all) not to know music, for they possess an innate gift of rhythm and phrasing (the latter being the offspring of the first), which, for the purpose of singing in public, renders the knowledge of music, to a certain extent, unnecessary to them. This gift of rhythm is an invaluable one, and is national. Italians rank pre-eminent; next come the Spaniards and the Portuguese; then the Hungarians and the Slavonic races, the Bohemians, Russians, and Poles; then the Germans, Swedes, and Danes; after them the French, and, last of all, the English and Americans. This is a fact which every great Italian teacher of singing, acquainted with the different nationalities will endorse. Let American singers, therefore, conscientiously study music; above all, the due appreciation of time into its very minutest details. Let them subdivide the divisions of each bar, until every note, dot, and pause has its correct value, not more, not less.

The students should understand that the great teachers of singing teach singing exclusively, not music. They teach the art of breathing, production, and cultivation of tone, scales in every form and variety, pronunciation, declamation, accent, and phrasing. All this, but never music. On the contrary, they expect a pupil to be perfect musically in every exercise or aria before coming to learn and sing it, and generally a separate teacher is engaged for this, so that no valuable time may be wasted in the singing lesson.

I repeat it, consider all of you that "Rome was not built in one day." There is no great singer who has not studied from three to five years, and this continually, uninterruptedly, making their studies the one great object of their lives. So studied Pasta, Malibran, Viardot, Bosio, Trebelli, Sontag, Lind, Nilsson, and so studies Adelina Patti, even now, daily; and that is why she is what she is, the most finished singer living.

My great master, the Chevalier de Micherout, in Milan—Pasta's master, as he was later that of Clara Novello and Catherine Hayes—told me how Pasta, to whose enormous, heavy voice a trill was especially difficult, studied this for five years. But when, at the end of that time, she suddenly introduced it one evening in Norma, in the cadence of "Casta Diva," the very roof of the enormous theatre of La Scala, in Milan, was shaken by the thunders of applause of an astonished and admiring audience, and the great singer's patient perseverance was rewarded by about forty recalls!

Study, study, study, I say to one and all. What is worth doing at all is worth doing well. Whatever the aim be to which your natural gifts entitle you—let it be the highest or a more modest one—comprehend, encompass this aim completely, entirely, undividedly. For the time being, let it be your only object; give it every thought, all your time, and all your strength; and, doing so, if you are guided by the right teacher, you will infallibly find out in the end that time, money, and perseverance have been well employed.

Boston, Hotel Boylston. ERMINIA RUDERSDORFF.

HERR AND MAD. JOACHIM IN VIENNA.

One of the most notable musical events here lately has been the appearance of the above celebrated artists. Dr Hanslick, in alluding to it, says:—

"The second Society's Concert, Gesellschafts-Concert, on the 10th January, boasted of a most extraordinary attraction in the co-operation of Joseph and Amalie Joachim. The glad tidings: 'Joachim is here,' was whispered to us as a greeting on all sides, and when he came forward, fiddle in hand, it seemed as though the enthusiasm would never end. Seven years have elapsed since he last played in Vienna, and many persons may, perhaps, not have immediately known him again, on account of the full, thick beard now encircling his once smooth face. But directly he drew the first sound from his instrument, no one could any longer fail to recognize him—only Joachim can play thus! What he played, too, was unmistakably Joachim—namely, the 'Ungarisches Concert,' a magnificent composition, which belongs to the greatest violin concertos not simply on account of its length. The public have become more familiar with and like it better every time it is repeated, though it requires to be performed with all Joachim's energy and dignity, as well as with his unfailing and inspired bravura. This virtuosity, ennobled by feeling and the most elevated conception, excited our admiration, also, in his rendering of a "Fantasia with Orchestra," by Robert Schumann, without, however, calling forth in us greater warmth for the work itself than it did seven years ago. The Fantasia, written for Joachim and never published (the copy in Schumann's own hand now before me bears the date: Dusseldorf, 7th September, 1853), is one of the composer's latest works, and is distinguished by a combination of all the inward characteristics peculiar to his third period, which was tending to so melancholy an end.

'A new, important, and most original work by Brahms; 'A Rhapsody for Contralto Solo, Male Chorus, and Orchestra' (Op. 53) could not possibly be more favourably introduced to us than by Mad. Amalie Joachim, who fulfilled her difficult task with incomparable beauty of voice and most expressive declamation. The gloomy seriousness of the style, and the fact that Goethe's verses (commencing interrogatively with the strange words: 'Aber abseits wer ist's?—'But who is it out of the way?') are ill adapted for music, besides being scarcely intelligible without a commentary, will render it a hard matter for this work to make its way among the general public. Brahms, who himself in the choice of his subjects keeps 'out of the way' of the broad lyric high road, has taken from Goethe's 'Harzreise im Winter,' a fragment which, according to Goethe's assertion, possesses a 'peculiar sentimentally romantic' history of its own." *

A new "Concert-Overture," without title or motto, by Herr Leo Grill, was performed, but failed in producing any deep impression, at the fourth Philharmonic Concert. Another item in the programme was an Orchestral Accompaniment, by Herr Abert, of two pieces of Sebastian Bach. First came the C sharp minor Prelude from the "Wohltemperirtes Clavier" (transposed to D minor). This was suddenly followed by a melancholy chorale—from Herr Abert's pen—for trumpets, horns, and bassoons exclusively, the whole being wound up quite as unexpectedly by Bach's Organ-Fugue in G minor. Madlle Anna Mehlig, of Stuttgart, played Herr Anton Rubinstein's Fourth Pianoforte Concerto. The concert was brought to a conclusion by Beethoven's Eighth Symphony, admirably executed under the direction of Herr Dessoff.

M. Lecocq's Girofle-Girofla has been produced with Madlle Meyerhoff and Herr Swoboda in the two principal characters. It is fairly successful, though far from exciting the enthusiasm evoked by La Fille de Mad. Angot.

The Gentle Craft.

A BARD is weak enough you'll find,
A humble catgut-twangler;
But for a man of simple mind
Commend me to an angler.
He'll fish and fish the whole year round,
Devotedly fanatic,
To catch one fish that weighs a pound,
And then his joy's ecstatic.

For twelve long months for such a catch
Who'd be on banks a dangler?—
But 'tis a fearful joy to snatch
To the contented angler.
And off he goes and "weighs it in"—
For breakfast has next morn it;
A cat, the thinnest of the thin,
Though fond of fish, would scorn it.

And after that he goes about
The anecdote to retail;
Of how he caught that one-pound trout,
With every little detail.
And rival brothers of the craft
Will listen to the story,
And puff their pipes, and round him waft
A baccy cloud of glory.

And all about the how and when
He'll argue like a wrangler;
There seems no bliss for mortal men
Like that which waits an angler.
And when he's old, and bald, and grey,
His children's children dun him
To tell them of that fish, and say
What great renown it won him.

More blest than men who write for books,
Or versifying mangler,
(Whose lines have rhymes instead of hooks)
The simple-minded angler.
So with this epitaph, no doubt,
His mild existence closes—
"The man who caught the one-pound trout Beneath this stone reposes."

Fun.

* "When the poet," Goethe tells us, "had written Werther, to free himself individually at least from the then prevalent morbid susceptibility," he was subjected to the great discomfort of being thought favourably inclined to this very frame of mind. He had to put up with a vast amount of correspondence which soon began to grow a burden to him. But among all who approached him with the request that he would assist them "in their misery of heart and mind," he was especially struck by a young theologian, named Plessing, in Wernigrode, who, to use Goethe's own words, "showed himself, in two letters, so writatively eloquent, as well as, at the same time, so seriously penetrated with dissatisfaction and self-torment, that it was impossible to fancy anyone to whom such soul-revelations could apply." Goethe resolved to visit the young man, but incognito. In mid-winter, on the 29th November, 1777, he separated from the Ducal travelling retinue, and rode alone to the Hartz Mountains. Immediately on arriving in Wernigrode, he visited his correspondent, who "exactly resembled his correspondence and, like the latter, excited interest, without creating sympathy." Goethe represented himself as a draughtsman from Gotha, and allowed the young man once more to pourtray, this time, orally, his melancholy mental condition. Goethe advised him to save himself, and seek deliverance from his painful and self-deceiving state by the contemplation of nature, and hearty sympathy with the rest of the world. He found him, however, so decidedly averse to making any attempt at a cure, "that his inmost heart was closed, and he considered his conscience fully freed by the irksome journey, and the knowledge that he was actuated by the best motives, and himself relieved from any further duty towards the young man." It was thus that Goethe took leave of this strange individual, to meet him again, in his proper character, first at Weimar, and then at Duisburg, where Plessing subsequently resided as a professor and philosophical writer. The middle portion of the "Harzreise im Winter" (the fragment set by Brahms) pourtrays the solitary and shy young man, and has rendered him immortal.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

BAYLIS BOIL.—The embalmed head of Oliver Cromwell is said to be in the possession of Mr Horace Wilkinson, Sevenoaks, Kent. It is reported that Dr Crane examined it phrenologically; but Dr Crane is as great a romancer as Dr Bridge himself. Mr Boil is wrong about Charles the Second, who preferred French dance music to any other. He should communicate with Mr William Chappell, who would give him all the desired information.

DEATH.

On the 9th inst., J. HENRY GRIESBACH, Esq. of Claremont House, Holland Street, Kensington, aged 75. Interred at Kensal Green Cemetery on Friday, Jan. 15th.

The Musical World,

LONDON, SATURDAY, JANUARY 23, 1875.

THE vague rumours which have long been floating about relative to the building of a new opera-house in London are putting on an intelligible shape. This fact is undoubtedly a surprise to many people; and it may be that we ourselves are among them. The matter has given rise to so much gossip for years past, such confident prophecies have been uttered with no corresponding result, and folk professing to know all about it have talked such extravagant nonsense, that other folk felt quite justified in placing the new opera-house among "Chateaux en Espagne." But there is "something in it" after all; and something of a very big sort. If report may be trusted—"there is much virtue in your if"—the site has been chosen, the plan decided upon, a good deal of the money gathered together, and, generally speaking, matters have been put in train. Accepting all that reaches us to be absolute truth, we shall, in two or three years' time, see the following:—A grand opera-house on the Thames Embankment, facing the river, and occupying a site between the new street from Charing Cross and the St Stephen's Club. In this house, performances of Italian opera will take place during the "season"; the rest of the year being devoted to English opera, or English adaptations of foreign works; the whole under the direction of Sir Michael Costa. This is something—the main thing, in point of fact—but it is not all. We are to have, still on the assumption aforesaid, a national school of music, wherein pupils will be fitted for success upon the lyric and terpsichorean stage. Moreover, there is talk of a pleasant garden on a portion of the site of five acres, of a grand Café, and other things besides, too visionary or too insignificant for particular notice here. Reflecting upon the whole scheme, imagination begins to play fantastic tricks. We see ourselves "bowling down" to the Embankment on some pleasant night in leafy June, passing through "a garden of delights"—or of delights without the first syllable, at all events; and, while fashionable London buzzes about us, varying the sounds of Verdi or Donizetti with the pop of champagne and soda-water. Very pleasant is all this, and we earnestly hope that it may "come true." But, unhappily, the present is a sceptical age, and one's tongue, from frequent exercise, knows its way to one's cheek as though by instinct. How much of our summer dream will be realized we shall not pretend to define, but it can hardly be rash to assume that, should anything come of it, the opera-house will take precedence. Let us hope for the opera-house. It is wanted badly enough, assuming that not only can London support two lyric theatres, but that it is well for lyric drama there should be two. This, however, is hardly an assumption. London can, if it likes, support two operas, and make them pay well, there being in what is called "society" more than enough of the requisite number of idlers; while that competition is good in this, as in most other things, need hardly be demonstrated. For such reasons alone, let us hope the scheme at present sketched in ink on paper will be sketched in stone on the Embankment.

Putting the matter in another way, benevolent persons will rejoice to find that Mr Mapleson is likely to improve, at last, upon the position of Noah's dove and find rest for the sole of his foot. He has too long been an Ishmaelite living in a tent; and liable to have the canvass blown down upon him. One cannot think without pity of that accomplished manager and urbane gentleman, as he has appeared ever since fire consumed the beautiful old house in the Haymarket, but more especially ever since the noble proprietor thought fit to rebuild with seeming design that it should never again be inhabited. Under the circumstances, doubtless, "Old Drury" was not a bad refuge; but Mr Mapleson, as head of our second Opera, deserves a better fate than that of a refugee. He ought to have a roof of his own overhead, and room enough around for his abundant energies, without the need to consult committees, or the obligation of accommodating "renters." So much, at all events, is promised by the new scheme, and so, much, we hope, will come to pass. For the rest—school, café, and what not—we can wait; deferring even anticipation till better grounds appear on which to base it.

MARIE KREBS AND STERNDALE BENNETT.

WE hear that the performance of Sir Sterndale Bennett's fourth pianoforte concerto, under Mr Hallé's direction, at the Manchester Concert Hall, on Monday last, was an extraordinary success. We are delighted—though by no means surprised.

OCCASIONAL NOTES.

THE Gaulois notices Mdme Patey thus:—

"Mdme Patey is an artist of great talent, and one cannot but be astonished that she is so little known; for, in truth, she is a star of the first order. Are there then names which command success? An 'e' the less, an 'i' the more, and lo! a Patti of a new kind—a Patti-Alboni, with the pure, round, balanced voice, velvety timbre of the famous contralto. The style is broader, and more commanding still, the expression more exquisite, the mezza voce more ravishing. Mdme Patey was applauded with enthusiasm."

DURING the past year, thirty-five new operas were produced in Italy; eleven in Germany; five in Russia; and two in Hungary.

THE celebrated Stradivarius which once belonged to M. La Mire, and subsequently to M. de Ploos, has just been purchased, for 9,000 francs, by Herr Krumholz, violoncellist, of Stuttgart. This instrument and those of Davidoff, Franchomme and Servais, are reckoned among the finest ever turned out by the maker.

AMONG the busts of the composers at the new Grand Opera-house, Paris, the bust of Donizetti is not to be seen. Some surprise has been manifested at this, considering that Dom Sebastian, I Martiri, La Favorita, Don Pasquale, Lucia, and La Figlia del Reggimento—several of which were composed expressly for Paris—are stock-pieces on the French lyric stage.

THE other day, a most peculiarly formed hand in plaster was sold by auction at the Hôtel des Ventes, Paris. The fingers were exceedingly long, and a chirologist declared it could only be the hand of some criminal. In 1846, it figured in the windows of all the music-shops of the French capital, with the following inscription: THE HAND OF LISZT. Price: 5 Francs. Pianists' hands have, probably, fallen in value, for this was knocked down, as part of a lot comprising old casts and broken crockery, at two francs!

SOME amount of badinage, persiflage, or, in plain English, "chaff," has lately fallen to the lot of those in authority at the Scala, Milan, for the new version, with which they favoured the public, in the ballet of Giulio Cesare, of the great commander's celebrated notification: Veni, Vidi, Vici. This the above gentlemen, or their property-man, changed to: Veni, Vidi, VINCI. The management of the Dal Verme appear as shaky in French as their colleagues are in Latin. In the lobby leading to the stalls of the last named theatre is a notice thus conceived: "Il est défendu D'ENTRÉE aux stalles aux Messieurs qui N'EN PRESENTANT pas le reçu de LUAGE."

DR VON BULOW ON THE VALUE OF THE METRONOME.—On Monday week, Mr Wellington Guernsey was in Schott's music saloon, Regent Street, seeking out the metronome marks and the exact tempo of the leading subjects as marked in the orchestra score of Meyerbeer's Huguenots, to be performed at the great brass band contest, to be held this spring in the north of England, under the management of Mr Richard Smith, of Hull, and a committee of noblemen and gentlemen. Dr Von Bülow happened to be present with Mr Guernsey, and politely afforded him the information and exact tempo of each of the several pieces required; stating that he conducted the opera in Berlin many times under the auspices of the composer, remarking that the metronome marks in the printed scores were not to be relied on; in fact, in many cases they could not be carried out. Dr Von Bülow agreed with Beethoven and Weber, who have left it on record, that the metronome was useless after the two first bars of any subject. Weber, on the first production of his Euryanthe, declared that after the tempo was given, leading off the subject, he could not be trammelled in his expression of the music, and the various effects to be given—in all of which remarks Dr Von Bülow agreed.

CONCERTS VARIOUS.

MR AGUILAR'S performance of pianoforte music, on Monday last, consisted of—Fantasia in C minor—Mozart; Suite in E minor—Handel; "Oft in the stilly night" (Transcription)—Aguilar; Overture-Scherzo—Aguilar; Nocturne in A flat, and Impromptu in A flat—Chopin; Sonata in G minor—Schumann; Lieder ohne Wörte—Mendelssohn; Fantasia on La Sonnambula—Thalberg; Appeal, and "In a wood on a windy day" (Transcriptions)—Aguilar; Day Dream and Valse Brillante—Aguilar. As usual, the rooms were filled with musical amateurs, who expressed themselves highly pleased with Mr Aguilar's performance.

MR W. H. HOLMES—writes the Standard,—the esteemed professor and composer, gave a recital at 26, Portland Place before a numerous and fashionable audience. The programme was well arranged, and the various selections appeared to give great satisfaction to those assembled, although demonstrations of enthusiasm were rarely indulged in. Mr Holmes played Beethoven's Sonata in A flat, Op. 26; Hammond's "Romance Russe;" Thalberg's Fantasia upon Themes from Les Huguenots; Incidental Overture, composed by Herbert Baines (first time of performance); Mr E. Land's Gavotte (first time); a couple of morceaux from his own pen; Liszt's "Gnomen-Reigen"; and Von Bülow's "Canzonnettura." In this comprehensive assortment Mr Holmes's versatility was thoroughly displayed, while the choice of pieces proved the soundness and discrimination of his judgment. Mr Holmes also joined Mr Lazarus in Weber's Duet for pianoforte and clarionet (Op. 47), and assisted in the performance of Sir Julius Benedict's Quartet for four players upon two pianofortes, introducing one of Chopin's Mazurkas (posthumous). In this work Mr Holmes was associated with the composer, Mdme Lütgen, and Mrs Montaigne, the quartet going so admirably that it was redemanded, and, in compliance with general request, repeated in its entirety. Mr Lazarus was in fine form; his playing, both in Weber's Duo and in the Adagio from Spohr's Second Clarionet Concerto, being marvellously brilliant and, at the same time, sympathetic. A feature in the concert, and an unusual one in a matinée musicale, was a trumpet solo, contributed by Mr T. Harper, facile princeps of all trumpeters. The immense difficulties of this instrument are well known, so well known, in fact, that musicians prefer to write for valved instruments, and obtain certainty of execution at the expense of brilliancy of tone. Mr Harper's performance upon the old slide trumpet is little short of extraordinary—a verdict with which all who heard him play "Il mio tesoro" (Don Juan) yesterday will thoroughly agree. In the vocal music, which was contributed by Miss Harper and Mr Frank Holmes, a new song by Mr W. H. Holmes, written to some very graceful lines by Mrs Baines, was a prominent item. Altogether, the recital may be said to have proved entirely successful.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.—A most interesting and attractive programme will be given at the Sacred Harmonic Society's next Concert, at Exeter Hall, on Friday, Feb. 5th, comprising Mozart's Mass No 1, Spohr's Christian's Prayer (works which have not been performed in London for many years), and Mendelssohn's music to Athalie. The principal soloists will be Miss Edith Wynne, Miss Ellen Horne, Miss Julia Elton, Mr Pearson, and Mr Distin. Mr Ryder is engaged to recite the illustrative verses in Athalie, and the performance will be conducted by Sir Michael Costa.

ROYAL ALBERT HALL CONCERTS.—Israel in Egypt will be the next Oratorio performed at these Concerts on Tuesday the 26th instant. The solo parts will be sung by Madlle Johanna Levier, Miss Katharine Poyntz, Miss Antoinette Sterling, Signor Fabrini, and Mr Sims Reeves; "The Lord is a man of war" being sung by the male voices of the Royal Albert Hall Choral Society. The Band, which has been considerably strengthened by the engagement of the best instrumentalists, will number over 100 performers. A very interesting feature at this Concert will be the appearance of M. Guilmant (the celebrated organist of La Trinité, Paris), who is to play Bach's Toccata and Fugue in D minor before the Oratorio, and between the parts "Improvisation sur des Motifs de Handel." The Oratorio will be conducted as usual by Mr Barnby.

PROVINCIAL.

WATFORD.—An evening concert was given in the Corn Exchange, January 19, under the patronage of the Earl of Essex, Earl Clarendon, Viscount Malden, Lord Ebury, etc., and proved a great success, the crowded audience being much pleased with the singing of Mr Ch. J. Bishenden, the well-known bass. Miss Kate Wild and Miss Farquharson also gave satisfaction in their solos. A trio, "The bells of St Michael's tower," sung by the Misses Wild and Farquharson, and Mr Bishenden, was well received. Miss Kate Saunders played two pianoforte solos with much taste and expression.

COLCHESTER.—An excellent concert was given at the Town Hall, on behalf of the fund being raised for the improvement of the play-ground of the Colchester Royal Grammar School. The Assembly Room was crowded by a large and fashionable audience, including the Mayor (Major Bishop), who is always amongst the foremost in furthering the interests of the boys of the school, Mr J. Round, M.P., etc. The chorus was composed of the boys of the school, a few "old boys," some members of the Colchester Glee Club, and other friends. Miss Florence Ashton and Miss Ellen Glanville, professional singers from London, performed the pieces allotted to them in a highly satisfactory way, and Mr Frank Holmes, who is an old favourite with Colchester audiences, particularly distinguished himself in Handel's fine song, "Honour and Arms." His voice has much improved since we last had the pleasure of hearing him. Among the performances of the amateurs there was much to admire. Miss K. Lockwood kindly acted as pianoforte accompanist, and Mr Alfred A. Barratt was an efficient conductor. We understand that the concert was a financial success.

BURGESS HILL (Sussex).—On the 7th of January, the St John's Institute and Reading Rooms were well filled by the inhabitants of the neighbourhood to witness the performance of the following entertainment, the proceeds of which were given to the poor of the district:—

Programme—Reading, Mr W. Banfield; Song, Mrs A. Mills: Comic Song, Mr T. S. Knight; Reading, Mr T. B. Crunden; Comic Duet, "The Awkward Squad," Messrs Frape and Potter; Recitation, "The Pied Piper," Mr Ellerton Hatton; Song, Mrs A. Mills. The entertainment concluded with the farce of The Thumping Legacy—Filippo Geromino (innkeeper), Mr A. Bowers; Jerry Ominous (his nephew), Mr Banfield; Bambogetti, Mr E. Hunt; Leoni, Mr Leggatt; Brigadier of Carabineers, Mr Sinnock; Rosetta (daughter of Filipo), Mr T. S. Knight.

The performers were all amateurs, residing in the locality, all of whom gave great satisfaction. A comic duet, admirably sung by Messrs Frape and Potter, was encored, and the reappearance of these two gentlemen elicited quite an ovation. The characters in the old farce, The Thumping Legacy, were capitally sustained; the make-up of Mr T. Sinnock as a Brigadier of Carabineers was very good; and the part of Rosetta (the innkeeper's daughter) found a fair and able representative in Mr T. S. Knight; indeed all the performers acquitted themselves excellently well, and their exertions were highly appreciated by the audience.

BRIGHTON.—An excellent performance of Rossini's Stabat Mater was given in the "Dome" on Friday evening last week, by Signor Campobello's party, consisting of Madame Campobello-Sinico, Madame Stella Bonheur, Signor Urio, and Signor Campobello. A large number of choristers were brought from London expressly to give due effect to the work, and these were strengthened by members of the local choirs. The solos were enthusiastically received, Madame Campobello-Sinico being encored in the "Inflammatus," Madame Stella Bonheur narrowly escaping an encore for her aria, "Fac ut portem," and Signor Urio and Signor Campobello receiving and meriting a warm acknowledgment for their excellent singing. Madame Campobello-Sinico was welcomed as an old established favourite. The fine mezzo-soprano voice of Madame Stella Bonheur was readily appreciated. Her voice and figure are well suited to the operatic stage, where she, no doubt, will soon take a high position. Signor Urio has made astonishing progress, and now sings with all the excellence of a really great artist. The performance of the Stabat Mater was ably conducted by Signor Campana, and the choruses received valuable assistance from Mr Josiah Pittman, who presided at the organ.—The special musical arrangements made for Saturday last at the Aquarium included the engagement of Madame Liebhart, a soprano who has already established her reputation and is familiar to the Aquarium audiences. Madame Liebhart sang "My mother bids me bind my hair," and "Little bird so sweetly singing," both of which she gave with her accustomed finish. The latter was unanimously encored, but the fair vocalist responded by singing "Comin' through the Rye." "Robin Adair" and "Good morning," her remaining contributions, were likewise much appreciated. Mr E. Reyloff, the conductor, must be praised for the excellence of the instrumental portion of the programme, consisting of Rossini's overture to Guillaume Tell, Weber's to Der Freischutz, Meyerbeer's "Marche du Sacre" (Prophète), Méhul's overture to Le Jeune Henri, and a selection rom Donizetti's Don Pasquale.

CHAPPELL'S "HISTORY OF MUSIC."

(To the Editor of "Nature.")

In a review ot my "History of Music," in Nature, p. 123, your musical critic takes me to task for having cautioned English readers against certain new theories which are to be found in the works of the late F. J. Fétis, and in the "Tonempfindungen" of Professor Helmholtz. I think those cautions were necessary, and perhaps, when your critic has studied the subject, he may think so too; but, in the meantime, he bows down before such names, and cautions me, that if Fétis were alive he "would not be in my shoes for a trifle." I should rather object to change shoes with the critic, but I may remind him that he seems to have forgotten his obligations to the readers of Nature. However diffident as to his qualification to controvert me, and therefore hoping for a second Fétis to arise, it was at least his duty to test each of us by the authorities which we quote, and to inform your readers of the result. He must know that two such opposite accounts cannot both be true, and, therefore, either the one or the other is not trustworthy. Fétis and I differ toto cœlo, even to the scales. I had supposed that a few of the extracts which I have adduced from Fétis's own works would have spoken for themselves, and have convinced any one who possesses critical knowledge that Fétis was a pretender, and that he was unable to understand the Greek treatises which he had before him. Your reviewer, however, is far too staunch-headed to be convinced, even though Fétis assumes to correct Aristoxenus in Greek, and Josephus in Hebrew.

My own conviction is unchanged by the second, third, and fourth volumes of Fétis's History. I find the same system of charging error upon others when he alone is in fault, and the same inability to understand the books before him. For instance, he had Kosegarten's translation of El Farabi's treatise on Persian, Greek, and Arab music, written at the beginning of the tenth century, but he could not discover from it that the Persians had then no thirds of tones in their scales. Neither did he find out that the Arabs had then emancipated themselves from the Greek minor scales, and had an excellent two-octave major scale, with perfect thirds in it, and a major seventh. It differed from ours, but rather for the better. These two points are most important in history, for in them we trace the comparative civilization from which those nations have declined.

As to Helmholtz's new musical theories, your reviewer complains that I have described his book as "hasty," when "it is the result of eight years' labour." I think ill-considered conclusions may, in polite terms, be described as "hasty." Secondly, that I have said, "Some very necessary experiments, such as those upon harmonics, were omitted." I am quite of that opinion, for I differ with him as to the existence of "over-tones," and I adduce proof that harmonics are subsequent to the principal notes, and not simultaneous. My arguments are before the world, and I have found them supported by others, including two of the very highest authorities. Until they can be rebutted, I have nothing to withdraw, but have much to add to them. The "Tonempfindungen" is not a book which requires more than ordinary intellect to understand; therefore, such deep submission as that of your critic is not necessary. When Helmholtz informs his readers that thirty-three consonant vibrations between B and C cause the dissonance of that interval, he is literally telling them that white is black; and yet this critic would have us believe him.

DEAR SIR,—In your kind and excellent notice of my concert on the 13th, you have not mentioned Sir Julius Benedict's quartet, for four performers on two pianofortes, introducing Chopin's Posthumous Mazurka, in which I had the honour to join with Sir Julius, Madame Lütgen, and Mrs Montaigne. The piece was received with great enthusiasm and encored. It is not in my province to speak of the composition or performance, but I cannot forbear to mention that Sir Julius Benedict came to the concert direct from Liverpool, thereby adding to the list of kindnesses I have received from him, for I wont say how many years; as it reminds me that "Time waits for no man," only (occasionally) one's pupils will not wait for time. I am, dear Sir, yours truly, W. H. HOLMES.

MR JOHN BOOSEY'S last "Ballad Concert," in St James's Hall, on Wednesday night, was one of the most brilliantly successful he has given.

THE Royal Albert Hall Concerts, under the auspices of Messrs Novello, were resumed on Thursday night. Herr Wilhelmj, the violinist, who has not been heard for some years in London, played Mendelssohn's Concerto, &c.

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

(From the "Daily Telegraph.")

The resumption of Mr Chappell's morning concerts on Saturday last was marked by one of the finest programmes conceivable; nearly every work chosen belonging to the highest order of excellence, and holding a place among the things best known to amateurs. When this is the case, and when the performers are equal to their task, the critic has very little to say. He is among the audience simply to be pleased, not for the purpose of plying his vocation; and if it needs be that he speak, it is as a chronicler, not as a judge. Our notice of Saturday's concert must, therefore, limit itself chiefly to facts, the most interesting of which refers to Mozart's Quintet in C minor, a work familiar to every lover of the great master, though only once before heard in St James's Hall. The "C minor" may not, perhaps, have a place in the front rank of Mozart's chamber compositions, nor could this be reasonably expected of a quintet which, in the first instance, was a serenade for wind instruments. But it is beautiful, nevertheless, and, as a specially good example of symmetrical structure, deserves hearing at a time when symmetry in music threatens to go out of fashion. The work, played in admirable style by Messrs Straus, Ries, Zerbini, Burnett, and Piatti, was very well received by the trained classicists whom these concerts draw together. Beethoven's Pianoforte Trio, the only other concerted piece, may be passed without remark; nor was the first of the two solos less familiar. Mdlle Krebs gave a powerful, yet reverent and truthful, interpretation of Beethoven's Sonata in F minor (Op. 57), for which she was much applauded and recalled; while, in Marcello's Sonata in F major, Signor Piatti, helped by Sir Julius Benedict as accompanist, displayed to advantage not only the old musician's formal melody, but his own unequalled power of execution. The vocalist was Miss Annie Sinclair, who contributed with much pleasantness of effect Handel's "Let me wander not unseen," and Sullivan's best Shakespearian song, "Orpheus with his lute." Altogether the concert was thoroughly enjoyable, and, if appearances mean anything, was thoroughly enjoyed.

On Monday evening took place the five hundredth performance given since February 14, 1859, when Mr Arthur S. Chappell, all unconscious, it may be assumed, of the significance of the event, first invited London amateurs to hear a selection of classical chamber music. The occasion, on the face of it, calls for no ordinary comment and congratulation, the more, because it stands alone in the annals of concert-giving. Never before did a musical enterprise celebrate its five hundredth programme within the space of seventeen years; and if the thing had been predicted of the high-class "Monday Pops," when first they started, everybody, perhaps even the prophet himself, would have laughed. But for all the rarity and significance of the event, we are not sure that there is any need to blow the trumpet over it. From the outset Mr Chappell has steered clear of sensation-mongering, thinking it best to pursue his way in quiet reliance upon the substantial claims of the work done. Even the temptation of a five hundredth concert did not move him further than to the presentation of music wholly taken from the opening programme. He might have made great fuss without incurring any blame; that he made none at all is a fact we shall now remember, and act upon. For, indeed, the "Monday Pops," closely entering, as they have done during seventeen years, into the musical life of the nation, are their own best expositors and champions. But, while vindication from outside would be superfluous, we may seize the opportunity of congratulating the director, and amateurs of music generally, upon an event fraught with considerations as weighty as they are obvious. Moreover, we offer the best compliment in our power when simply wishing that the enterprise may reach a thousandth concert, and then be in its hot youth. The first programme consisted wholly of the works of Mendelssohn, so, as a matter of course, did that presented on Monday night, choice falling upon the quintet in B flat (Op. 87), the sonata in F minor (Op. 4), for pianoforte and violin, the Tema con variazioni in D (Op. 17), for pianoforte and violoncello, and the quartet in D (Op. 44)—on the whole a fairly representative group. The opening quintet, played to absolute perfection—no other words can be used—by Madame Néruda, M.M. Ries, Zerbini, Straus, and Piatti, made a profound effect, the andante scherzando—hearing which one is more disposed to weep than to laugh—being tumultuously encored. Miss Zimmermann was associated with Madame Néruda in the sonata; and the accomplished ladies did full justice to a work wherein, no matter what its comparative merit, we have a shining example of precocity. An emphatic word of praise for the execution of the variations and quartet, as well as for that by Misses Gaetano and Fairman of two part songs, is necessary to complete our record of this interesting occasion, and it should be said of Sir Julius Benedict, who conducted the first Monday Popular Concert, that he presided over the five hundredth with unabated energy and skill.

MUSIC AT BOULOGNE-SUR-MER.

(From our Correspondent.)

A grand concert, under the patronage of the Sous-Prefet, the Mayor, Administrateurs de l'Hospice, and Mdme la Baronne Salomon de Rothschild, was given on Friday, January 15, by Herr Reichardt, "avec le concours" de Mdlle Carlotta Patti, Mdlle Blahetka, Mdmes Carlier-Guilmant, Pellereau, et Mdlle Cécile Keene; Les dames et Messieurs amateurs de la ville la Société de l'Orphéon, et la Société Musicale. The object for which this concert was got up by Herr Reichardt was, as usual, a charitable one, viz., "pour la fondation d'un lit, de Vieillard ou d'Orphelin à l'Hospice de Boulogne." The programme was long, and the concert lasted over three hours. It was very well attended, and the receipts, including subscriptions previously collected in the town, in Paris, and notably a liberal donation from the Lord Mayor and Sheriffs, who were solicited for the same while on their short visit here, were, I believe, quite sufficient to carry out the object in view.

Beethoven's overture to Egmont, and a fantasia on airs from Weber's Oberon, were very well performed—especially the latter—by the band of the Société Musicale, at the commencement of each part of the programme; but a brass band is certainly better heard out of doors than in a large saloon like that of the Etablissement des Bains. The Société de l'Orphéon, who sang a scène chorale, "Le Tyrol," by A. Thomas, under their able conductor, M. Picard, gave general satisfaction. A Mdme C. sang with expression and taste, "Voi che Sapête." Herr Reichardt did not, as usual, charm his audience with a solo, but took part in two trios, "Ti prego o Madre," and "Pour les attraits de noble dame." I need hardly add that he met with great applause. Last of all, in the way of vocal music, I must allude to the singing of Mdlle Carlotta Patti, who was simply charming in her interpretation of the "Inflammatus," from Rossini's Stabat Mater (assisted by the amateurs and "Orphéons"); a romance, composed by Herr Reichardt expressly for the occasion, "L'Orpheline et l'Ange"—the name of the composer and the interpretation of the song by Madame Carlotta Patti being, of course, sufficient to elicite hearty applause; and the bolero from the Vêpres Siciliennes (Verdi). There was, also, a solo on the violin by a M. X.

The great instrumental performance of the evening was an andante and allegro "pour deux piano à huit mains" by the late M. Ascher, performed by Mdme Blahetka, Mdme Carlier-Guilmant, Pellereau, and Mdlle Cecilia Keene. It was a real treat to hear this performance by four well-known and highly esteemed professors of music in this town, and they were loudly recalled at the conclusion. The concert was brought to a close by Gounod's Gallia, a strange composition to finish a concert with.

Herr Reichardt's concert proved a decided success, and he has "made his bed" at the Hôpital St Louis, for some poor viellard or orphan.

I must write you a line about the Theatre, as I have not mentioned M. Troy's capital troupe of artists for a long time. La Rose de St Flour, Lischen and Fritschen, La Chanson de Fortunio, as operettas, and Gavart Minard et Cie, Les Inutiles, Le Roman d'un jeune homme pauvre, Les premiers armes de Richelieu, and Nos Domestiques, together with several little vaudevilles, have attracted average audiences, the operettas being put on exceedingly well, especially La Rose de St Flour and La Chanson de Fortunio. Among the dramas Les Inutiles was the best played, and well appreciated. Scrivaneck will visit us on Saturday next, and play in Gentil Bernard for one night only.

The English inhabitants of Boulogne were so well pleased with the hearty and magnificent reception of the Lord Mayor here, and of the numerous invitations sent out among them to meet his Lordship, that a movement is on foot to return the kindness of the Maire and Conseil Municipale by offering them a grand ball at the Etablissement des Bains. Already a committee has been formed of the most influential gentlemen of the English residents, and steps taken to ensure success. Mr Hanbury Williams, J.P., well known and much respected here for many years, is the chairman of the same, and is ably supported by the Vice-Consul, Mr Stigand, Messrs Stone, Merridew, Farmer, Clements, and others, Dr Chater acting as secretary. MOZART AND GRÉTRY.*

Though Mozart did not succeed in getting anything produced at our Académie de Musique, his sojourn in France exercised, for all that, a very great influence on the development of his genius. His circle of acquaintances procured him access to the Opera, and the Comédie-Italienne, as our Opéra-Comique was then styled. He made exceedingly good use of this advantage, and we know that even subsequently he studied our scores with marked predilection. A friend of his, who one day surprised him surrounded by the works of Gluck and Grétry, asked if he did not think it would be more worth his while to study the works of Italian composers. "As far as melody is concerned, yes," replied Mozart, "but as regards truthfulness of diction and dramatic expression, no!"

Even, however, had we not gathered from his own lips this valuable and flattering avowal, his scores would, instead of himself, bear witness to the respect he entertained for our masters. Gluck's influence is manifest. As for that of Grétry, to cite only one example, it is sufficient to compare the admirable finale of Le Nozze di Figaro: "Esci, ormai, garzon mal nato," with that of L'Amant jaloux, "Plus d'égards, plus de prudence," to feel convinced that the former is faithfully traced upon the latter. There is even so complete an analogy between the motive of Grétry's andante: "Il ne sait plus que dire," and Mozart's "Signora, cos' è quel stupore?" that we feel almost inclined to reproach the most opulent and prodigal of masters with having borrowed from another.

For these reasons it struck me that it would be amusing and instructive to give here a complete list of all the operas, serious and comic, played in Paris during Mozart's stay there. I trust my readers will forgive me this somewhat dry roll of names; the number of minutes they will lose in reading it will certainly be less than the number of hours it took me to compile.

From the 23rd March to the 28th September, 1778, the works performed at the Opéra were Armide, Alceste, Iphigenie en Aulide, and Orphée, Gluck; Roland, Piccini; Ernelinde, Philidor; Le Devin du Village, J. J. Rousseau; Les trois Ages de l'Opéra, Grétry; La Fête de Flore, Trial; La Fête du Village, Gossec; and Myrtil et Lycoris, Désormery, without counting the performances of the Italian company, who gave: Le finte Gemelle, Piccini; Le due Contesse, and La Frascatana, Paisiello; La Serva padrona, Pergolese; and Il Curioso indiscreto, Anfossi.

During the same period, the following comic operas were represented at the Comédie Italienne: Sylvain, Le Tableau parlant, Zémire et Azor, La Rosière de Salency, Le Huron, Les deux Avares, L'Ami de la Maison, Lucile, Le Jugement de Midas, Les Mariages Samnites, and Le Magnifique, Grétry; La belle Arsène, Le Cadi Dupé, Rose et Colas, Le Déserteur, Le Roi et le Fermier, Le Maître en Droit, and On ne s'avise jamais de tout, Monsigny; Les Femmes vengées, Le Bûcheron, Tom Jones, Sancho Panza, and Le Maréchal Ferrant, Philidor; La Clochette, Les Sabots, La bonne Fille, Le Milicien, Les deux Chasseurs et la Laitière, Le Peintre amoureux de son Modèle, and Mazet, Duni; Les trois Fermiers, and Zulima et Julie, Dézèdes; Le Tonnelier, Audinot; Isabelle et Gertrude, Blaise; Les Femmes et le Secret, Vachon; L'Amoureux de quinze Ans, Martini; La Bonne Fille, Piccini; La Servante Maîtresse, Pergolese; L'Olympiade and La Colonie, Sacchini; Bastien et Bastienne, La Servante justifiée, Le Coq du Village, Le Diable à quatre, and Acajou, pieces parodied from popular ariettas.

To this list must be added the oratorios executed at the Sacred Concerts: La Sortie de l'Egypte and La Destruction de Jérusalem, Rigel; Le Sacrifice d'Abraham, Cambini; and Suzanne, Bambini, not forgetting the Stabat Mater of Pergolese.

If Mozart did not witness the performance of all these pieces, it is certain that he was present at the representation of a great many of them. As for their authors, he does not appear to have sought their society. In this respect, he was reserved, and followed the advice given him by his father to stand on a footing of strict politeness in his dealings with his brothers in art, but not to go beyond it. Then Gluck was no longer in Paris, and, as for Piccini, Mozart had known him in Italy. Gossec was too undemonstrative, and, with regard to Grétry, whose disposition would certainly have agreed very well with Mozart's, he frequented the society of the philosophers, from whom the young composer's religious principles must have made him recoil with horror. VICTOR WILDER.

WAIFS.

The new theatre at Odessa is ready for opening.

The tenor, Salomon, has left Brussels, and returned to the Paris Opéra.

Madame Annette Essipoff has been playing in Paris at the Pasdeloup concerts.

La Favorite succeeds La Juive at the Grand Opéra, with Faure as the King.

The first two parts of the Messiah have been performed at Dijon with great success.

The concert tour of the artists of Her Majesty's Opera commenced on Monday last.

On Christmas day last, Tannhäuser was performed at St Petersburgh for the first time.

Schumann's Manfred is reported to have met with very great success at the Vienna Opera.

Mdlle de Belocca has been singing at Marseilles and Nice, under the management of M. Strakosch.

Herr Hanslick, the well-known Viennese critic, is about to publish a volume entitled Modern Opera.

The San Carlo at Naples will be closed next Carnival for the first time since its foundation 160 years ago.

Verdi has declined an invitation from the Turin municipality to visit that city on the occasion of the production of Aida.

Portions of Bach's Mass in B minor were performed at a recent Conservatoire Concert. Really, the Parisians are growing serious in their tastes.

Herr Joachim will arrive in London about the 12th prox., and will probably make his rentrée at the Monday popular Concerts on the 22nd February.

All the principal artists who shared in the gala representation at the Grand Opéra have received presents from the Fine Art Minister, of Sèvres china, &c.

Verdi's Requiem for Manzoni is to be given, under the direction of its illustrious composer, at Messrs Novello and Co.'s concerts in the Royal Albert Hall, during the course of the season.

The Rock says:—"A renewed attempt on the part of the London Committee to secure the Albert Hall for Messrs Moody and Sankey, for one or more meetings, has, like the first, proved unsuccessful."

Mr John Francis Barnett's Lay of the Last Minstrel, which was so successfully produced at the Liverpool Musical Festival, is to be performed at Reading on the 28th instant; at Mr Kuhe's Brighton Festival; at Mr Charles Hallé's Concerts in Manchester; and probably at the Crystal Palace.

It is a melancholy truth that musicians have a poorer opinion of each other than other people entertain of them. The fact is well illustrated in the public schools of Philadelphia, where it is even feared that the study of music is in danger of being thrown out of the school system, by the unceasing wrangling of the musicians, who cannot all have a berth, and consequently are not satisfied with the way in which the music is conducted. This disgraceful state of things should stop.

NATIONAL MUSIC MEETINGS.—Mr S. Flood Page, the Secretary of the Crystal Palace, writes to us to correct misapprehensions which prevail with reference to the National Music Meetings for this year. He states that the third series of competitive performances between choral societies, solo singers, and military bands will be held at the Crystal Palace on the 1st, 2nd, 5th, 6th, 7th, 8th, and 10th of July next; that authorized editions of the music to be prepared for performance are published by Messrs Novello and Co. and Messrs Metzler and Co., and that rules, forms of entry, and all other particulars can be obtained on application at his office, or by letter addressed to Mr Willert Beale, at the Crystal Palace.—Times.

Mdlle Krebs arrived in London on Friday week, to play at last Monday's Popular Concert, at St James's Hall. Mdlle Krebs is peculiarly fortunate in pleasing both parties of our critics of pianoforte players.

Herr Otto Peiniger, Professor of the violin at Harrow school, who, during the time of his studies at the Royal Academy in Berlin, acted as accompanist to Her Imperial Highness the Crown Princess of Germany, had the honour of performing at the Palace in Berlin, on the 30th December, 1874, before their Imperial Highnesses and a distinguished circle, and met with great approbation.

Mr Sims Reeves is well again. He appeared at Mr John Boosey's Ballad Concert, at St James's Hall, on Saturday afternoon. Mr Reeves is a "draw" in more senses than one. As a tenor vocalist of the highest rank, his name alone, if there was any sort of certainty that he would actually sing, is always sufficient to attract an audience, while the very doubt of his appearance "draws" many persons to see whether he disappoints or not. When he actually appears, the audience usually displays every symptom of temporary insanity, recalling him four or five times, and making frantic attempts to induce an encore. When he disappoints, people hoot and howl, and make it unpleasant for the other artists engaged. No vocalist in England can tamper with the tempers of the audiences and the reputation of himself like Mr Sims Reeves, who, in this sense, stands alone in this country, and for the best of all reasons, because he is the greatest artist, and almost the only perfectly finished tenor vocalist we possess.—Figaro.

An iron fence surrounds Mozart's tomb, and at each corner is planted an evergreen-tree. The lot is not more than ten feet square, which goes to prove how valuable ground is in St Marx Cemetery, and how little a great man is appreciated after death. Strange to say, the tomb is situated in immediate proximity to the common graves, and far distant from the aristocratic portion of the cemetery. What a pity it is to see the man who certainly was the greatest musician that ever lived, and whose music is the delight and admiration of every true scholar of music, thus buried in an obscure corner of an old country graveyard! How differently is Washington entombed at Mt Vernon, or Virgil at Naples. In Corinne, we read of the latter's tomb: "It overlooks the Bay of Naples; and such is the magnificent repose of the spot that one is tempted to believe the bard himself must have selected it. These simple words from his Georgics might have served him for an epitaph: Illo Virgilium me tempore dulcis alebat Parthenope. There did soft Parthenope receive me."

A New Tenor.—A musical entertainment took place on Wednesday afternoon, December 30th, at the Argentina Theatre, Rome, on which occasion, Mr Durward Lyall, a new tenor, and a young aspirant for the lyric stage, being on a visit to his friend, Mr Allen Fraser of Hospitalfield, made the first public trial of his voice before a select audience of ladies and gentlemen, now sojourning in the Eternal City, and among others the celebrated tenor, Signor Mario. Mr Durward Lyall, who possesses, among other personal advantages, that of a fine figure, sang with much taste the "Spirito gentil" (Favorita) "All'età dell'innocenza" (Bravo) "All'umil ostel natio" (Promessi Sposi) and "Che vidi? Amici" (Zelmira), and in each won a tribute of applause. He is gifted with a fine voice which is at once powerful, compact, sustained and vibrating. A Scotchman by birth, he will probably Italianize his name, and, on the completion of his studies at Milan, where he has already resided during the last two years and a half, will make his public début on the stage, and, no doubt, take the foremost rank among the celebrities of the musical world.

Barcelona.—A new opera, Quasimodo, is shortly to be produced at the Teatro del Liceo. It is by a Spanish composer, Señor Pedrell.

Berlin.—Herr Ernst, from the Stadttheater, Leipsic, has appeared at the Royal Operahouse as Adolar, in Weber's Euryanthe, and met with a favourable reception. Mad. Mallinger was Euryanthe, Madlle Brandt, Eglantine; and Herr Betz, Lysiart.—Herr R. Wüerst's new comic opera, A-ing-fo-hi, is in active rehearsal, and will be produced about the end of the present month. Le Roi l'a dit (Der König hat's gesagt), by M. Delibes, is laid by till next season, but then it will be given with Miss Minnie Hauck in the principal part.—A new series of Quartet Concerts has lately been started by Herren Struss, Boldtmann, Wegener, and Philipsen, and their example is shortly to be followed by Herr Rehfeldt, so that there will be soon four different sets of Quartet Concerts going on simultaneously here. The programme at the inaugural concert given by the four gentlemen first named included Beethoven's G major Quartet, and a new Pianoforte Quintet by Herr Ernst Eduard Taubert, who himself took part in its performance. At Joachim's last Quartet Soirée, the works executed were Mendelssohn's two Quartet Fragments known as Op. 81, Haydn's Quartet in E flat major, Op. 72, and Beethoven's in C sharp minor.—Herr Joseph Wieniawski is making a professional tour in Germany. He was to play here on the 20th inst., and afterwards to visit Stettin, Dantzig, Bromberg, Posen, Breslau, Nuremberg, and Munich.

Kiel.—Herr A. Scholz has announced three more concerts of Orchestral Music. Among the works selected for performance are Beethoven's "Eroica," Lachner's "Suite, No. II.," and Raff's "Waldsymphonie." Herr Scholz's orchestra numbers forty members, and, since he commenced these concerts, his programmes have included compositions by Beethoven, Berlioz, Gade, Liszt, Mendelssohn, R. Wagner, and others of less note.

Leipsic.—The Duke of Coburg-Gotha's opera, Santa Chiara, first produced here in 1859, has been revived at the Stadttheater.—The King of Denmark has conferred the Gold Medal of Merit for Art and Science on Herr Karl Reinecke.

Vienna.—Mad. Pauline Lucca was to commence a fresh engagement at the Imperial Operahouse, as Mignon, in M. Ambroise Thomas's opera of the same name.—According to the Wiener Sonn- und Feiertage Courier, Madlle Mathilde Sessi will shortly return to the stage, and appear at the Comic Opera as Marie in La Fille du Régiment.

THE VOICE & SINGING
BY
ADOLFO FERRARI.
THE FORMATION AND CULTIVATION OF THE VOICE FOR SINGING.
Price 12s.
London: Duncan Davison & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

"The remarkable qualities of this book are the author's freedom from conventional trammels, the strong sense of his opinions, and the novelty yet evident soundness of his precepts; his work has consequently come into general use as a manual of vocal instruction."—Daily News.

DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE,
For invigorating and enriching the voice, and removing affections of the throat.

DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE is universally acknowledged to be the most valuable remedy for sore throat, hoarseness and relaxed throat. It should always be taken before singing or reciting, as it strengthens the vocal organs. It is most extensively prescribed by the faculty for the throat and voice. Dr Lewis of Basingstoke says he finds them most efficacious, and in Dr Copland's Dictionary of Practical Medicine (Longman & Co.), they are strongly recommended at pages 872 and 1492. They are used by all the greatest vocalists and orators in Europe, and have been established over a quarter of a century. Testimonials from Patti, Grisi, Lablache, Santley, &c. Sold in boxes, 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. by all Chemists throughout the United Kingdom and the Colonies.

"L'ORPHELINE ET L'ANGE."
ROMANCE.
Composed by ALEXANDER REICHARDT.
SUNG BY MDLLE CARLOTTA PATTI.

A peine ai-je vu le printemps
Couvrir dix fois de leur feuillage
Les vieux saules de nos étangs,
Que, sans pitié pour mon jeune âge,
Dieu m'a ravi le guide aimé
Qui me prodiguait ses tendresses!
Je pleure son regard charmé!
Je ne reçois plus ses caresses!

Ainsi parlait, en gémissant,
Une orpheline désolée;
Mais un bel ange, l'embrassant,
Lui dit, d'une voix inspirée:
"Ne pleure plus et sois ma sœur
Ma mère sera notre mère,
Et tu verras que du bonheur
Il en est encor sur la terre!"

ALBERT HALL CONCERTS.

The directors of these concerts thought it well to close the daily series at Christmas, for reasons which none can be able to appreciate than themselves; and in making a final reference to that spirited and well-worked enterprise we must express our decided opinion that it simply anticipated what, ere long, though perhaps in another place, will be a success. At present the time is not ripe, but the directors, while acknowledging the fact, have chosen to limit their operations to a narrower space, rather than give them up altogether. Orchestral music, oratorios, and "popular" compositions may still be heard in the Royal Albert Hall; the difference being that, instead of six concerts a week, there are only two. A difference exists, however, beyond this—one which represents a clear gain to music and its amateurs. With a band materially strengthened in numbers and improved in quality, with plenty of time for adequate rehearsal, and with energies unjaded by continuous exercise, the directors can, and doubtless will, give performances of the highest merit. It has often been said that the situation of the Albert Hall is fatal to its success as a concert-room. We do not underrate the disadvantage thus referred to, but, on the other hand, it is a fact beyond question that, wherever a genuine attraction appears the public will gather to it. If, therefore, the Albert Hall concerts sustain a high pitch of excellence, the journey to Kensington will speedily count for little with those to whom they appeal. That the directors are aware of this may be assumed without hesitation, and the doings of Thursday night made evident a resolve to act upon their knowledge. In all such enterprises the character of the orchestra is a most important consideration; for, if the orchestra cannot be said to make success, it is able effectually to mar it. The individual players should not only be competent men, but their number should be regulated with a strict regard to the effects exacted by the music in hand. Rightly or wrongly—the question cannot here be discussed—orchestral music now depends rather upon sonority and tone-colour than upon anything else; while, for reasons which are obvious, if not satisfactory, the public like the change. Hence the composition of the renovated Albert Hall orchestra was examined with interest on Thursday evening, when the new series of concerts began. On one point the result proved satisfactory beyond all chance of dispute. The players are individually competent, and number in their ranks many of our most famous artists, including Messrs Pollitzer (chef d'attaque), Burnett, Zerbini, J. Howell, Svendsen, Dubrucq, Lazarus, Wootton, Wendland, and T. Harper. Such a band needs but discipline and experience of its conductor to reach the highest point of excellence. Whether it have strength enough for the area of the Albert Hall is a question open to discussion, our own opinion being that twenty more strings would effect a vast improvement, because meeting the popular exigencies of a place which, though resonant in a special degree, requires great body of tone. These extra instruments will, we hear, be added for the oratorio performances; but they are wanted most in orchestral music, and it is to be hoped that the directors will recognise the need. When pointing this out, we do not underrate the vast improvement shown by the performance, on Thursday week, of the overture to Guillaume Tell, the Pastoral Symphony, and Wagner's Kaiser March. Rather would we insist upon the improvement as demonstrating that further development in the same direction must lead to augmented good. The performance just referred to was, in varied respects, the most satisfactory that has yet taken place in the Albert Hall. It brought the music near to the audience, instead of leaving an impression that the players were in the next parish, and its effect was proportionate. To the familiar works just mentioned the programme added Mr G. A. Macfarren's overture to St John the Baptist—an excellent representative of native talent. The prelude to our gifted countryman's oratorio bids fair to achieve the rare honour of frequent hearing apart from its sequel, each successive performance strengthening a conviction that it is one of the most masterly achievements of modern art. A special feature of the concert was the reappearance of Herr Wilhelmj, who made himself a name in England nine years ago, but has since paid us no more than one brief visit. In 1866 this master of the violin had just arrived at man's estate, and, in view of the rare qualities he then displayed, it was easy to assume that he would return with augmented powers, as well as greater maturity of style. The expectation is now met in a measure, perhaps, little anticipated, Herr Wilhelmj coming to us as an artist of a rank altogether exceptional. He played on Thursday night the Concerto of Mendelssohn, a Romance from his own pen, and an adaptation, also by himself, of Chopin's Larghetto, exhibiting in each the rarest powers. His tone is splendidly pure, full, and equal; his bowing faultless, and his executive skill as exemplified in double-stopping, octaves, &c., beyond reproach. In short, Herr Wilhelmj's technique is that of a perfect violinist, and the acutest listener fails to detect a flaw in his performance. But he is something more than an executant, and it would appear from the selection of pieces that he holds tours de force of the ordinary kind in small account. The expression of his playing in the slow movements evidenced a rare store of that artistic instinct which, while essential to perfection, cannot be gained by culture. Every phrase of the melodies was made eloquent, and between the music and those who heard it the executant established a close and sympathetic bond. We have in Herr Wilhelmj a great artist, and as such the audience treated him, an enthusiastic recall following the Concerto, while the Larghetto had to be repeated. The vocal music was entrusted to Mdlle Johanna Levier, who sang "Sombre forêt," Mendelssohn's "Zuleika," and Schubert's "Wohin," with great taste and intelligence, obtaining an encore for the last-named. Signor Fabbrini, as substitute, at very short notice, for Mr Sims Reeves, also did service worthy of acknowledgment. Mr Randegger was a skilful accompanist, and Mr Barnby conducted with zeal and ability.

"Israel in Egypt" was performed on Tuesday, when, also, M. Guilmant, the famous organist of the Trinité, Paris, played a Toccata and Fugue by Bach, as well as improvised upon Handelian themes.

MADAME PATEY IN PARIS.

Apropos of Madame Patey's second appearance in the Messiah at the Cirque des Champs Elysées, we read in the Ménéstrel:—"As for Madame Patey, her success assumed the proportion of a veritable triumph. Everybody agreed that since the retirement of Alboni there has not been heard a contralto voice so powerful and vigorous. But Madame Patey has not only an incomparable organ, she has a fine artistic organization. She speaks as admirably as she sings. Faure, who knows her well, told us the other day that, as an interpreter of Handel, Madame Patey is simply perfection; and one of the best Parisian critics also assured us, after having listened to "He shall feed His flock," that never in his life had he heard it sung in better style, or with greater largeness of effect. Let those who would accuse us of exaggeration go, next Thursday, to the Cirque des Champs Elysées, for then Madame Patey will be heard for the last time unless, which seems probable and is much to be desired, the Conservatoire Concert directors profit by her stay among us to give her a place in the next programme."

Brussels.—The weather here has lately been as unhealthy as in most of the other European capitals, and the members of the company at the Théâtre Royal de la Monnaie have not escaped its baneful effects. This has necessitated sudden changes in the bill, and even the closing of the doors for a night or so. Madlle Leslino has been laid up; so has Madlle Hamaekers; so has Madlle Priola; and so, also, have several of the leading members of the corps de ballet. No wonder that the rehearsals of La Perle du Brésil, Le Noxze, Le Bal Masqué, and La Reine de Chypre, have been temporarily interrupted. It was as much as the artists could do to sing in the evening, without previously taxing their powers in the morning. To recompense him for this ill-luck, the manager looks forward to the grand gala performance which is to come off on the 3rd of February. It is already impossible to procure a place, although the price of admission is fixed at 20 francs. Several of the boxes in the middle of the house are to be thrown into one, so as to form a large Royal box. It is said that the opera will be Le Prophète, with M. Sylva, of the Grand Opera, Paris, as Jean de Leyde, supposing that M. Warot, who has, by his engagement, an exclusive right to the part, consents—which is not so sure.—Sig. Smecchia's Italian company have commenced proceedings with Un Ballo in Maschera and Don Pasquale, but they have not hitherto drawn very full houses, although the Queen, the Princess Louise, and the Comtesse de Flandre, have graced the performances with their presence.—M. Joseph Wieniawski, the pianist, will shortly give some concerts here. He has been playing recently, with marked success, at St Petersburgh.

ST PAUL'S CATHEDRAL.

The special service, with appropriate high-class music as part of it, for the festival of the Conversion of St Paul, seems now more than likely to become an annual ceremony in St Paul's Cathedral. Instituted in 1873, it was held for the third time on Monday afternoon, when, despite the weather, which had been so unpromising for the first half of the day, a vast crowd assembled some time before the service was to begin. The Cathedral was lighted up as for ordinary evening prayer, the effect being imposing and splendid. The general arrangements were much the same as on previous occasions, but it may at once be added that further experience has brought with it improvement of no common sort. We refer, of course, to the musical department of the ceremony, which now in most instances may defy criticism. How much of this is due to Dr Stainer, the present learned and able organist of St Paul's, need scarcely be insisted on. Dr Stainer, however, on these particular occasions, abandons the organ-loft for the conductor's place, and beats time for the orchestra and choir—a task for which he is eminently qualified. His post at the organ is occupied by Mr George Cooper, of St Sepulchre's, long recognised by musicians as one of the most accomplished masters of the "Emperor of Instruments;" and, as there is direct communication between conductor and organist, through mechanical contrivances unnecessary to explain, all goes well. While the congregation was coming in Mr Cooper played a voluntary, in which, among other impressive passages, could be recognised a slow movement of an essentially religious character from one of the quintets of Onslow. The voluntary over, there was the accustomed procession of the Cathedral clergy and the host of choristers, men and boys numbering some 300; the singers of St Paul's being strengthened by voluntary delegates from the famous choirs of Mr Henry Leslie, Mr Joseph Barnby, &c. During the procession the organ was silent, as on former occasions. Then the orchestra, about 50 in number, led by that excellent violinist, Mr Amor, and selected from our best instrumental performers, played the magnificent overture to Mendelssohn's oratorio, St Paul, which will, in all probability, for years hence form an integral part of these special ceremonials. The organ joined in the peroration where the Lutheran choral of which Mendelssohn has made such noble use elsewhere is referred to. After this, contrary to traditional custom, there was no sermon, the order of evening prayer immediately following the overture. That the time-honoured responses of Tallis, "festival use," were employed, it is hardly requisite to say. The Psalms for the occasion (110, 112, and 157) were respectively sung to single chants by Dr Crotch (in B flat), Lamb (in F), and Dr Stainer (in C)—the "Gloria" given out, as usual, in unison, by the choir, with full organ accompaniment. The "Magnificat" and "Nunc Dimittis" has been set to music (in the key of C) expressly for the present "Dedication Festival," by Mr Henry Gadsby, a young musician, formerly a chorister boy (with Dr Stainer) in St Paul's Cathedral, who is rapidly attaining a high rank in his profession. There is much to admire in this short festival service—so much, indeed, as to make those who have heard it once desirous of hearing it again. The "Magnificat" is bright and vigorous from beginning to end, and the only criticism that can be fairly urged against the "Nunc Dimittis," which opens with earnest and, at the same time, simple expressiveness, is on account of the somewhat too frequent transitions in so brief and appropriately unpretending a movement. The piece is instrumented in very admirable style for full orchestra, and, under the watchful direction of Dr Stainer, was extremely well given by all who took part in it.

The selection from Mendelssohn's oratorio which took the place of "Anthem," a term which now seems to assume a wide elasticity, was remarkable alike for the interest of the music and the general excellence of the performance. Of course it opened with the incident of the Conversion, beginning with the recitative, "And as Saul journeyed he came to Damascus," followed by the miraculous appeal from Heaven, "Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou Me," leading to the superb chorus, "Rise up, arise, and shine, for thy light comes," and the no less superb chorale, "Sleepers, awake, a voice is calling," in which Mendelssohn has exhibited all the might of his wonderful genius. To these succeeded most of the remainder of the first part of the oratorio, including the air, "O God, have mercy," and the noble final chorus, "O great is the depth of the wisdom and knowledge of the Father," besides a large portion of the second part, among the most noticeable choral performances in which were "The Lord is good," "How lovely are the messengers that preach us the Gospel of peace," "See what love hath the Father bestowed on us," and the splendid peroration, "Not only unto Him," which brings the oratorio so impressively to an end. It is only just to add the names of the solo singers. The tenors were Messrs F. Walker, Kerr Gedge, and Kenningham; the basses were Messrs Winn, Kempton, De Lacey, and Thurley Beale; two young chorister boys, Masters Grover and Hollis, singing a great number of the recitatives with more than promising ability. The solos which may be cited as among those deserving most praise were, "O God, have mercy upon me" (Mr Winn), and "Be thou faithful unto death," with violoncello obbligato (Mr Kerr Gedge). The performance was generally so good as to confer the highest credit upon Dr Stainer, who conducted from the front of the lectern, so that few among the congregation could see him. After the selection from St Paul, worship was resumed as in due order.

It should be mentioned that the prayers were intoned by Dr Simpson, and the Lessons read by the Rev. Mr Milman, both minor canons in the Cathedral. As the vast congregation slowly dispersed, Mr Cooper gave an organ "postlude" (in D) by Mr Henry Smart, one of our foremost composers of Church music, so fine in itself and so admirably executed that very many turned back to hear it to the end.

OPERA ON SUNDAY EVENINGS.

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

SIR,—We are informed from New York that since the beginning of last November some of the playhouses in that city have given performances of operas on Sunday evenings; some time previously sacred music had been given, then operatic, and now entire operas. The result has been a controversy between the clergy and the playhouse managers, and that the churches are comparatively empty, the houses full to overflowing.

As England is now the only European state in which theatres are closed on Sunday (all large capitals throughout the world, I may add, have Sunday evening theatrical performances), I may be permitted, perhaps, to inquire whether she ought not to follow the example of her American cousins? And I would also ask what harm, if any, would result from her doing so? A singular proof can be given that all Englishmen do not object to Sunday evening performances, as, when travelling on the Continent, they form a very important portion of the audience.

Is it injurious to morals or to religion to open the theatres on Sunday evenings? As far as I can judge it cannot be, because if it be injurious to morals and religion, they ought not to be opened at all. It is, therefore, only the question, not of the injury to morality or religion, but of controverting acts of Parliament which prohibit Sunday amusements.

As there would be no compulsory enactment about going to theatres on Sunday evenings, like the unrepealed act of 1616 about attending churches, the people in general, having so advanced in education and judgment, might surely be allowed to choose between the listening to a good sermon or a good performance.—Yours obediently, L. L.

[The experiment has, we believe, proved a failure in New York; and we earnestly trust it will never be attempted here.—ED.]

ROME.—At the Teatro Apollo, Les Huguenots was to be followed by La Forza del Destino, with Signore Stolz, Pasqigli, Signori Masini, Aldighieri, Viganotti, and Nannetti. Thanks to the dancing of Signora Zucchi and the magnificence of the mise-en-scène, the ballet of Ellinor still keeps possession of the bills, from which, had it depended on its own attraction alone, it would probably have long ago disappeared.—At the Teatro Rossini, a great success has been achieved by La Donna di più Caratteri, a very old opera by Guglielmi. Signora Fortuna and Sig. Eurici especially distinguished themselves in it. Among the other operas performed at the same theatre may be mentioned Giannina e Bernadone, by Cimarosa, and Il Barbiere. Le Astuzie Femminile, also by Cimarosa, was to be produced ere long.—A short time since the walls of the capital were covered with bills announcing a concert to be given by an artist styling himself Paganini Redivivus. Whether the public suspected a hoax, or whether they thought that the price of admission, five lire, too much, it is impossible to say. One thing, however, is certain, namely, that the number of the curious was so limited that Paganini Redivivus did not feel inclined to play, and so the concert never came off.

ANOTHER VIENNESE CRITIC ON HERR AND MAD. JOACHIM.

When we pronounce the name of Joseph Joachim, everyone knows that we have designated the artist who occupies, pretty well without opposition, the first position among the violinists of the present day. He introduced himself on this occasion at the Society's concert with his "Ungarisches Concert," a composition grandiose in its peculiarity, and one which it would be difficult to find another artist to play like him. Schumann's "Fantasia," which followed it, was, however, not a happy selection. It looms before us gray, gloomy and absolutely ghostlike—not even the execution of a Joachim can lend animation to the traces of melancholy sorrow and of mental wearisomeness characterising this production which Schumann composed shortly before the tragic end of his productivity and of his life. But what shall I say of the concert got up by the Master, in conjunction with his wife, Amalie Joachim? We can hardly recollect a purer and a higher artistic treat than that then offered us. It will long shine in our memory. Joachim first played with Brahms the E major Sonata, one of the six composed by Bach, between 1718 and 1722, when he was Capellmeister at Anhalt-Köthen. "The violin part requires a master," says Forckel, in his Biography of Bach. So it does—and the pianoforte part also. These Sonatas are no dainties for "little ladies with a sweet tooth"—"Süssweindämchen"—as Griepenkerl says somewhere or other—they are music for men, powerful and strong as iron. Tartini's productions are of gentler stuff; the way in which Joachim played one of this composer's Sonatas carried every one away, but then it is scarcely possible to hear aught more perfect in tone, expression, and style. These works were followed by a "Sarabande," and a "Tambourin" of Leclair's. It would be, perhaps, advisable, with these numbers, for it briefly to be stated in the programme to the public, who probably imagine that Leclair is quite a new Parisian composer, where they are to look for him, for they are not sufficiently versed in musical history to be aware that there was even one Leclair, far less three. Antoine Leclair, the father, and the sons, Jean Marie and Antoine Rémi. We have here to do with Jean Marie, the violinist, and composer of many brilliant violin pieces, as well as of an opera, Glaucus et Scylla. He was born, in 1697, at Lyons, and murdered in Paris, on the 22nd October, 1764, it never having been discovered by whose hand he fell. The two charming pieces, played by Joachim in a manner simply incomparable, have all the character of the Rameau period, the value of which is beginning only now to be once more appreciated. At this period, the name of "Tambourin" was employed to designate certain pieces of ballet and other music, such as we find in Dardanus, by Rameau, and elsewhere. Leclair's piece combines with this the old French rondo form—a constantly recurring theme with free episodes. As played by Joachim, it sounded like the jubilation and the tumult of a folk's festival—a couple of young girls stealing, now and then, out of the festive throng, to whisper in each other's ear all kind of jokes and saucy notions. A Romance full of sweet melody, and composed by Joachim himself, was enacted by Brahms and Joachim with the "Hungarian Dances"; it seemed as though the God Apollo had visited the Gipsies—and the public were set all a-glow by the fire of the performance. The whole wound up with Beethoven's Stringed Quartet in C major, which raised the enthusiasm of the public to the highest pitch. During the Introduction, which is so ticklish an ordeal for the performers, and which progresses veiled, as it were, in clouds, the audience scarcely ventured to breathe. The stormy fugued Finale was nothing less than a blaze of fire, and never have we heard the unrivalled A minor Andante, to say the least, more beautifully performed. But then Herr Joachim had fellow-executants worthy of himself; the tenor sounded truly magnificent in the hands of Herr Hellmesberger, and we beg Herr Röver, the violoncellist, to receive our especial compliment for his Pizzicati in the Andante; they were clear as a bell. We felt especially pleased to find that the second violin, Herr Hellmesberger, junr., held his ground so well in the dangerous vicinity of the first violin. Let the reader, for instance, call to mind the passage in the Finale where the four parts wander, one after another, with the extended Fugue-Theme, like indignant spirits through the wide realms of space. The violino secondo follows immediately the violino primo; then comes the angry viola, and, last of all, the violoncello. There was but one tone and one tint in all four instruments.

Mad. Amalie Joachim first sang Schubert's "Zuleika"—one of the most beautiful and least known of his compositions—then Schumann's "Lust der Sturmnacht" (repeated), and, lastly, three delicious songs by Brahms: "Ewige Liebe," "Auf dem See," and "Sandmännchen." At the last, a charming cradle-song, which Mad. Joachim rendered with entrancing mezza voce, the audience became, so to speak, perfectly wild; every stanza was applauded. I am not sure whether I ought to award the palm for execution to this song or to "Zuleika." What a singer of songs! At the Gesellschafts concert, Mad. Joachim took the contralto solo in Bach's Whitsuntide cantata, "O ewiges Feuer," and in the "Rhapsodie" (on Goethe's "Harz-Reise im Winter") by Brahms—both pieces, as far as intonation is concerned, absolutely bristling with difficulties for the vocalist. May Brahms always find a lady who, for instance, can take the downward seventh with which he illustrates the word "Oede" as surely as Mad. Joachim. The composition, I am not ashamed, to confess, moved me deeply. The words, "Ist auf deinen Psalter," for example, are a prayer from the bottom of the heart—no everyday preghiera, but something full of love and the purest feeling in every tone. Wonderfully does the woman's voice here float over the deeper sounds of the tenors and basses of the chorus. He who produced a composition like this can be tranquil as to what his contemporaries and posterity will say of him. A. W. AMBROS.

MUSICAL ARTISTS' SOCIETY.

This young and very promising society held a third trial of new compositions on the 15th inst., in the concert-room of the Royal Academy of Music. The scheme of the afternoon evidently excited much interest; and there was a goodly attendance of the professionals and amateurs necessary to make up a thoroughly critical "bench of justice." Among the important works submitted for approval were a string quartet in A, by Mr J. Lea Summers, another in G minor, by Mr Baumer, a pianoforte sonata in F sharp minor by Mr H. C. Banister, and a couple of solos for the same instrument by Mr Eaton Faning. Our musical readers do not need to be told that the names of all these composers are associated with a fair repute based upon actual achievement; nor will they be surprised to learn that, in the present instance, each work showed very considerable merit—just that degree of it, in fact, which the Musical Artists' Society wishes to develop and encourage. The quartet by Mr Summers, though not free from occasional redundancy, is a work of high talent, and says much for the power of a composer who will, in course of time, assert himself far more. Mr Baumer's quartet, if written some years ago, as we are told, does infinite credit to its author's ability; nor were the pianoforte pieces, played by their respective composers, less suggestive of undeveloped, and conclusive of developed, skill. Some songs, chosen from the works of Messrs Gilbert, Gardner, and Banister, with others by Liszt, Hiller, &c., were sung by Miss Jessie Jones, Mary Davis, Sophie Ferrari, Mr W. A. Howells, &c.

Looking back upon the society's first season, we must congratulate it upon much good work well done. A modest beginning has been made, it is true, but we are told not to "despise the day of small things," and it is allowable to assume that, carried on with discretion and spirit, the Musical Artists' Society will one day work for art on a larger scale.

A Poem for Penny Readings.

Prophetic traces
O'er worlds prevail;
The comet dances
With fulvous tail;

While cataclysms
Unbought remain;
And viewless schisms
Still shake the chain;

While cyclics flaccid
A void create;
And steep in acid
The permeate;

While a polysyllable
Whirls through space;
While acres tillable
Doom efface;

While rubrics whistle
Behind the plough;
And wreaths of thistle
Deck slumber's brow;

While clouds of butter
The years enslave,
I still will utter
The thoughts that rave.

Fun.

ST GEORGE'S HALL.

Mr and Mrs German Reed, still faithfully followed by a crowd of old admirers, are now in possession of a new programme. The Yuletide festival having been duly recognised by the production of The Three Tenants, in association with Mr Corney Grain's Enchanted Piano, another occasion was found on Monday evening to bring forward the third novelty in the form of "a very national probability," called The Ancient Britons. The slight action of the dramatic sketch is assigned to a period three thousand years hence, when London is supposed to have gone the way of Nineveh and Babylon, and when an exploring traveller from the Fiji Islands, then the centre of civilization, stands by the ruins of Westminster Bridge to gaze on the crumbling remains of the Houses of Parliament, and hear of the hungry wolf creeping down Holborn Valley and the red deer roaming in Rotten Row. The picturesqueness of this desolation is revealed in an effective scene, admirably painted by Mr John O'Connor; and the capability of the subject as a vehicle for good-humoured satire becomes at once displayed when the spot is selected for the performance of that solemn, self-sacrificial British rite traditionally known as a "pic-nic." The participators in this ancient ceremony bear the names of Caractacus, Cassivelaunus, Boadicea, Imogen, and Nesta, for, the tribe of Smith having overrun the island, no distinctive surname exists. Their mysterious proceedings are watched with deep interest by the adventurous traveller from the South Seas, who, supplied with a guide-book imparting some remarkable information concerning the manners and customs of the Victorian age, finds nothing has endured but the convenient costumes of that epoch. Ultimately he is captured by the feminine division of the party, to be shown as the literary lion of the season; and to the fierce attack made upon his affections by the two young women, who boast their proficiency in the art of fascination, the exploring bachelor eventually succumbs. The fanciful theme is difficult to sustain after the satirical allusions are exhausted; and the author, Mr Gilbert à Becket, when he has sent off every shaft in his quiver, shows a sound discretion in preferring to meet the charge of rather an abrupt conclusion than the complaint of an undue elaboration of story. This diverting trifle, for which Mr German Reed has composed some tuneful music, is excellently supported by Mrs German Reed as the ancient British matron, Miss Leonora Braham and Miss Fanny Holland as the couple of contending damsels, Mr Alfred Reed as the eager explorer of Ancient Britain, and Mr Corney Grain as the stately warrior who is "an hereditary Horse Guard." The musical fairy tale of The Enchanted Piano, so cleverly told and so skilfully illustrated by Mr Corney Grain, increases in popularity; and the lively dramatic sketch of The Three Tenants now terminates an entertainment to be heartily enjoyed for the sake of its mirth-creating properties, and to be warmly commended on account of its refinement.

M. BILLET'S PIANOFORTE RECITAL.

Of a series of three recitals of classical music, which M. Billet, a distinguished Franco-Russian pianist, resident in London, has announced, the first took place on Wednesday, at St George's Hall, before an appreciative audience. The trio in G, by Haydn, which was the first piece in the programme, and in which the concert giver was associated with MM. Sainton and Paque, was an enjoyable performance. The charming and highly characteristic "Rondo all' Ongarese" was capitally played. The solo sonata was the one by Dussek, in F minor, Op. 77 ("L'invocation"), one of the best works of its description, now too seldom heard, however. M. Billet's light and brilliant touch, his fine technique, and his intelligent phrasing, were as much appreciated in Dussek's as they were in Beethoven's sonata in C minor (Op. 30, No. 2), in which he was admirably seconded by M. Sainton. M. Billet's technical accomplishments were amply exhibited in other pieces of the programme, especially so in Fugues by Handel, Bach, and Mendelssohn, in F, A minor, and F minor, respectively. M. Billet also played a gavotte by M. Charles Lecocq; and we need hardly remark how strange the name of the popular composer of La Fille de Madame Angot and Les Cent Vierges looked in a programme of "classical" music. Miss Emily Spiller was the vocalist, and Herr Lehmeyer accompanied her on the pianoforte.

SIGMUND MENKES.

THE MESSIAH AND MADAME PATEY IN PARIS.

(From the "Daily Telegraph.")

It is a somewhat surprising circumstance that Handel's Messiah has been received here with wonderful favour, and that an English singer has made a great success. Strange as this double fact may be, it is nevertheless true. There seems a very good chance of oratorio being popularised in France. A certain M. Charles Lamoureux seems determined to give a fair trial to the masterpieces which have delighted England for more than a century. He has taken the summer circus in the Champs Elysées, and has fitted it up with a gigantic orchestra and a sufficiently capable organ, and once every week he invites his countrymen to listen to a composer whom they have hitherto only known by name. He not only "calls up spirits from the vasty deep" of Parisian opera bouffe, but, mirabile dictu, "they do come when they are called." I referred some time ago to the original criticisms, evincing the deepest interest in the subject, which welcomed the production of Judas Maccabæus. M. Lamoureux has followed up the warlike drama with the far more didactic Messiah; and this also has not only been listened to with respect, but applauded with enthusiasm. On the first night Madame MacMahon led the applause; but at the second performance the work was submitted to a far severer test. It was held in the afternoon; and to say sooth, a more depressing sight can scarcely be imagined than that presented by the Champs Elysées on the dark and stormy day in question. The wind blew in gusts strong enough to carry a woman in full sail off her feet, and the rain lay in pools half a foot deep on the morass-like walks of the Elysian fields. Moreover, it was not possible for the visitors to approach the entrance except by walking, the door abutting on the road being cleverly closed to the general public. Nor was the interior of the edifice particularly in harmony with the work to be performed; for the shape of the building, to say nothing of the decorations, recalls scenes in the circus, half of which latter is taken up by the reserve seats. The Cirque was not full, the weather having doubtless kept many music lovers at home; but the audience made up in demonstrations of general approval for what they lacked in number. To an English ear the French words sound at first strangely unfitted to the character of the music; but I am bound to say that Victor Wilder has well performed his most difficult task. The orchestra and chorus numbered in all three hundred executants; and though the voices lacked the volume of tone to which we are accustomed in England, the choruses were, without exception, remarkably well sung, and they produced an unquestionably powerful impression. What struck me most forcibly was the admirable success with which the conductor, M. Lamoureux, preserved all the tempi consecrated by English tradition. There was none of the hurrying of time which I had expected to hear, nor any unnecessary rallentandos, for the production of any extravagant effects. If the conductor had passed his life in Exeter Hall, he could not have respected more religiously the intentions of the composer. Some of the soloists "left to be desired," to use a French idiom; but in this respect, again, the audience showed as much appreciation as power of admiration, for they left many of the solos unnoticed, and heaped all their applause on the performance of Madame Patey. This lady has performed a feat which is worthy to be registered among the tours de force of the singing profession. She is not, as I understand, a French scholar; but she pronounced the words with a distinctness which made every syllable tell, and with a purity that left no room for criticism. All the Frenchmen present with whom I happened to speak were unanimous in their praise, and the critics write as though they had first discovered the fine quality of the singer's voice. Contraltos, it must be remembered, are exceedingly rare in France; and Madame Patey's welcome on that account is even warmer than it would have been in any English town in which her capabilities were unknown.

COPENHAGEN.—The recent attractions at the Theatre Royal have been Le Postillon de Longjumeau and La Dame Blanche.—According to report, an Italian operatic company will give a series of performances here next month, including in their programme Così fan tutti and Dinorah. A concert company, also, headed by Mad. Déméric-Lablache, will shortly visit this capital. They commenced their tour, on the 18th inst., at Malmö.

LONDON BALLAD CONCERTS.

The fourth concert of the series, given in St James's Hall, on Wednesday evening, was a great success—great as regards the audience, who crammed the room; great as regards the programme; not less great with respect to the audience. Operations commenced by the London Vocal Union, now our best glee party, singing Beales's "What, oh!" but the successes of the evening commenced when Mr Santley sang Blumenthal's "Boatman's Song," and won an encore, to which he responded with Gounod's "Maid of Athens." The next encore fell to Mr Edward Lloyd's rendering of Austin's "Roll Call;" the next to Gatty's "The hay is in the mow," sung by Miss Antoinette Sterling. Three encores in succession are pretty well, but they only served to whet the appetite of the audience, who began briskly in the second part with Miss Sterling, compelling her to repeat Miss Philp's "Poacher's Widow," or sing something else, the American contralto choosing the latter course, and giving "Don't be sorrowful, darling." Still the ballad lovers were not happy—at least, not as happy as they wished—and when Mr Santley sang "The yeoman's wedding" he had to return and throw "My Polly" to his exacting admirers. Yet, even after this, they, like a many-throated Oliver Twist, asked for more, and our popular baritone gave them, out of his inexhaustible good nature, the ever-welcome "To Anthea." Were the people content then? Not a bit of it; for when Miss Sterling had sung once, "'Tis no time to take a wife," they made her sing it twice; and were very near exacting the same obedience from more than one or two of her successors. After this, need it be repeated that the concert was, in its way, a splendid success; or that the artists engaged did their duty like men and women. Quite as superfluous is the remark that an entertainment so much enjoyed served to strengthen, in very material degree, the position of Mr John Boosey's well-conducted enterprise.

MAD. LAFON AT THE ITALIENS, PARIS.

Bellini's work, Norma, was performed on Thur-day, before a well-attended house. When she appeared on the stage, it was evident that Mad. Lafon was deeply agitated. There was a profound silence; the lady sang her first few notes; the silence was broken, and the public were convinced that Mad. Lafon is indeed a great singer. She was in full possession of all her powers. Throughout the performance she was never wanting for a single moment. Her voice is even, frank, and distinguished by freshness and striking beauty. Her high notes are perfect, and so are her lower ones, while those of the medium register are admirable. Thus, the evening was a genuine triumph for her. At every instant she was interrupted by applause, and greeted by reiterated bravos, while flowers and bouquets strewed the stage. She was recalled several times in each act. The habitués said: At last M. Bagier has given us a perfect Norma; for not only does she sing this crushing part admirably, but plays it like a great tragic actress. Ah! if M. Halanzier had been in the house!

This evening will count for much in the artistic career of Mad. Lafon. She has confounded her detractors; and Paris—Paris, which makes the reputation of great artists—has now re-baptised her. Let M. Bagier hasten to secure her services; otherwise his follow-impresarii, always on the watch for celebrities, might snatch this star from him, for she is known to sing in the French style as well as in the Italian.—L'Europe Artiste, Jan. 24th.

MR W. H. HOLMES'S RECITAL

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

DEAR MR EDITOR,—As many of the readers of the notice I gave of Mr W. H. Holmes's concert in your issue of the 13th inst., and of that gentleman's letter in your last week's impression, might be led to think I intentionally omitted to speak of Sir Julius Benedict and the performance of his fine work, I should feel obliged if you would allow me to explain the reason. It was announced in the programme that Sir Julius had kindly promised to perform "in some part of the programme." In order to have my notice of the concert inserted in your ensuing number, I had to leave at five o'clock, before the end of the concert, and before Sir Julius Benedict had arrived, and so it was not possible for me to write: "Sir Julius Benedict played brilliantly, and was enthusiastically applauded," as I am sure I should have done had I been present. Although generally averse to intrude myself upon the public, I cannot refrain from stating that I do so now with pleasure, being glad to have an opportunity of acknowledging the numerous kind acts which artists receive almost daily from Sir Julius Benedict, for whom no one has more regard than yours, very sincerely,

5, Fitzroy Square, W., 26th Jan., 1875. SIGMUND MENKES.

THE LATE WILLIAM ASPULL, ESQ.

On the night of the sixteenth inst. died William Aspull, Esq., at a ripe old age, after a long and lingering illness, at the house of his faithful and sincere friend and pupil, F. B. Chatterton, Esq., lessee of the Theatre Royal, Drury Lane, who, with his kind and amiable wife, watched over with the tenderest care the good old man, and did all that could be done or thought of to lighten the load of adversity and suffering in his declining years. William Aspull was one of those men whom to know was to love; a polished and refined gentleman in manner, thought, and action; noble hearted and generous to a degree, with an exquisite tenderness for the feelings of others; and no one can tell how full his heart was with gratitude to his benefactors for their devoted care and attention, from day to day, while he was lying on his bed, helpless and gradually fading away. When speaking of his faithful friends, I have seen the big tears chase each other down the good old man's furrowed cheeks, which told more than words could tell the fulness of his heart. He was borne to his final resting-place—the Norwood Cemetery—on the 21st;—followed and mourned by those who will love his memory, till they too are summoned to give up all that is of this world. May their end be like his—Peace!

As a musician, Mr Aspull was one of the good old school, full of feeling and tenderness, with a soft and delicate touch. He had a great contempt and horror of the present smash and crash style, and used to say, "It is not music. Music is discoursing sweet sounds full of melody and pathos—not a row, enough to deafen one! The pianoforte, sir, was never to be hammered upon like a blacksmith's anvil." He used to follow this up by remarking, "You can get as much power out of the instrument as is required without trying to smash it to pieces, if you know how to touch the instrument properly. Few professors of the present day teach their pupils how to touch the keys, but hammer, hammer, hammer away as hard as they can." When in full practice of his profession, Mr Aspull taught some of the highest and noblest in the land, and composed many of the most successful songs and pieces of his day.

"HAMLET" AGAIN.

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

SIR,—Concerning the gentlemen-dogs, Rosencrantz and Guildenstern, who preferred to be "commanded" rather than entreated by the King, it matters not whether such "indifferent children of the earth" were mad or sane. If, as some great authority says, all men are more or less mad, it is evident that in the case of R. and G., there could not have been a large amount of insanity. I, for my part, prefer the madness of some persons to the sanity of others, especially if these others are to be likened to a "sponge," in the sense in which Hamlet uses the word regarding Rosencrantz and Guildenstern.

Sanity is confiding, madness is suspicious. Accept these propositions as axioms, and you will be able to account for Rosencrantz and Guildenstern being executed in the stead of Hamlet. The King's minions had no suspicion that the packet had been tampered with. Hamlet, before getting on board the pirate ship, leaving R. and G. on the vessel bound for England, had substituted—as you so well know—a despatch for the immediate dispatch of his two quondam friends, having the original document in his pocket, which was to have occasioned his own execution. If Rosencrantz and Guildenstern had not been contemptible creatures, we should have felt pity for them; and had Hamlet been put upon his trial for his share in the business, with our present notions, it cannot be doubted for a moment that he would have been "let off" on the ground of insanity. Hamlet's conduct here is an illustration of that "method," which is occasionally applied to madness, when the word cunning would be a more expressive term for the principle which guides the madman's acts.

"The madman's cunning doth sometimes excel
The sane man's planning, help'd by wit as well."

I am, Sir, yours obediently,

18*th January*, 1875. F. E. PENNA.

[Let our correspondent read his Hamlet more attentively. He will find that Hamlet only did what any other (except a madman) would have done in his place. But he was cleverer than the King, and cleverer than his sincere friends, Rosencrantz and Guildenstern.—ED. M. W.]

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS,

ST JAMES'S HALL.

SEVENTEENTH SEASON, 1874-5.

DIRECTOR—MR S. ARTHUR CHAPPELL.

THE NINETEENTH CONCERT OF THE SEASON

WILL TAKE PLACE ON

SIR STERNDALE BENNETT is very seriously ill—much more seriously than has been imagined. Since Sunday the gravest apprehensions have been entertained; and, indeed, there appears to be very little hope of his recovery.

—o—

A PARAGRAPH in another column settles as fact the rumour that Mr Mapleson intends to settle himself on the Thames Embankment. The Metropolitan Board of Works, it seems, unanimously agreed to the terms upon which our "enterprising impresario" takes the land he wants for eighty years. We accept this uncommon agreement of the Board as an excellent augury. The Board, though high and mighty enough to tax 4,000,000 of people at its will, is, after all, but an aggregate Parish Mind, and the Parish Mind, as a rule, is fussy, and prone to raise objections on every conceivable and inconceivable pretext, so long as its own importance can, in the faintest degree, be thereby asserted. How Mr Mapleson contrived to woo and win the biggest Bumble in the universe is a mystery, unless, indeed, he went to Spring Gardens and pleaded his own cause. In that case we can understand the result without trouble. Mr Mapleson, "gay and debonair," eloquent of tongue, and winning of smile, would simply control the delegates of the Vestries as Van Amburgh controlled his lions. But no matter how the thing was done. Done it is, and, the premier pas taken, the rest, let us hope, will follow quickly.

We anticipate, then, an Opera House worthy of the name, on the finest site that London can offer. But, if it is to be merely a place where, during the spring and summer months, the birds of fashion will congregate to chatter and display their plumage; if it is to be merely a place where Bellini, Donizetti, Meyerbeer, Rossini, Gounod and Mozart, in well-worn dresses, succeed each other on the stage; if it is to be merely a place where this or that operatic star condescends to shine as per a very—for the manager—onerous agreement, all we can say is that we do not care about the concern further than as it affects the well-being of many excellent people. The fact has often been proclaimed, and must be trumpeted many times again, that Italian opera, as now carried on in this country, is of the very smallest artistic value. One "house" the less or more makes no difference whatever to music, which probably would flourish better if there were none at all. But, if we would not deprive the "upper ten" of an amusement which supplies persons with a good opportunity of rubbing shoulders against other "sets" than their own, we would have Italian opera regarded as nothing but an "amusement," destitute of high significance or serious claim to attention and respect. So far, then, the promised new House appeals but slightly to the sympathy of musicians. But Mr Mapleson gives us hope that the new building will be more than a fashionable temple. Lady Clara Vere de Vere may flash her diamonds there in the proper season, and flirt with the "oiled and curled Assyrian bulls," who "yaw-yaw" approval of the leading danseuse; but when these people have cleared out, serious opera is to enter and take possession. By serious opera we mean that which appeals to a musical public on musical grounds, and is prepared to stand or fall according as it bears the test of artistic criticism. For that part of the scheme which promises to train English men and women for the lyric stage, and to employ them afterwards, we have abundant sympathy. Should it be realised, the one great void in our musical system will be filled, and English opera may begin to hope that the "good time coming" is at length near. Mr Mapleson will be another Orpheus, at whose music—

"Plants and flowers
Ever sprung, as sun and showers,
There had been a lasting spring."

And under his benign rule, our national lyric drama, such as it is, may revive, blossom, and bear rich fruit. In expectation of this, we shall watch the ripening of the scheme with constant interest, and with a hope that, amid the cares of Italian opera, Mr Mapleson will not lose sight of that branch in the enterprise which commends itself most to every lover of music.

OCCASIONAL NOTES.

A PLACE in the higher ranks of the musical profession has just been vacated through the death of Mr John Henry Griesbach, one of those examples (says a contemporary), too rare among men of his standing, of the thorough and yet not mere musician. An excellent theorist, a practised and agreeable composer, an accomplished pianist, able, also, to touch with no mean skill several other instruments, Mr Griesbach found time to turn to account a great aptitude for mathematics in the cultivation of astronomy, mechanics, optics, and acoustics. On the last subject he has left a work, an "Analysis of Musical Sounds," which is a model of orderly and clear, yet thorough, exposition. He took a lively and active part in the attempts made some years since by the Society of Arts to lower and fix the present uncertain "pitch" of musical instruments; and with an ear delicate by nature and cultivated by experience to a high discriminating power, he was a warm advocate for what is known as "equal temperament." Mr Griesbach will live long in the memory of those who enjoyed opportunities during his short life of penetrating the veil which his rare modesty and simple-mindedness threw over his genius and acquirements.—Sunday Times.

THE NEW LONDON OPERA HOUSE.—The Board of Works met on Monday for the purpose of considering the arrangement made by Mr Mapleson with the Commissioners, for the erection of a new opera house in the street which is to be formed, consequent upon the demolition of Northumberland House, between Charing Cross and the Thames Embankment. The Board unanimously sanctioned the conditions whereby Mr Mapleson has obtained a lease of the ground for eighty years.

THE following, according to the Gazzetta Musicale di Milano, is the age of some of the leading musical papers: At Milan—the Cosmorama Pittorico has entered on its 40th year; La Fama, on its 34th; Il Trovatore, on its 22nd; Il Monitore dei Teatri, on its 15th; Il Mondo Artistico, on its 9th. At Florence—L'Italia Artistica, on its 16th; Il Bellini, on its 4th. At Turin—Il Pirata, on its 42nd. At Rome—La Palestra Musicale, on its 15th. At Naples—L'Omnibus on its 43rd. At Urbino—the Raffaello, on its 7th. At Trieste—L'Arte, on its 6th. In Paris—La Gazette Musical, on its 42nd; La Ménéstrel, on its 42nd; L'Art Musical, on its 14th. In Brussels—Le Guide Musical, on its 21st. In Barcellona, La España Musical, on its 10th; and El Correo de Teatros, on its 8th. La Gazzetta di Milano itself has seen its 30th birthday, and is stronger and more flourishing than ever. [The Musical World has seen its 40th year, and all genuine lovers of music are anxiously looking forward to its 80th. Posterity will see the 160th.—D. P.]

BAIREUTH.—Herr Richard Wagner's Grand-National-Stage-Play-Festival-Theatre is pretty nearly completed. Inside, nothing is wanting save a few trifling details. It appears that the lighting of the stage is something unique—but so is everything connected with the wonderful edifice, if we can believe Herr Wagner and Herr Wagner's partisans. The machinery has been constructed by Herr Brand, the celebrated stage machinist, or "master carpenter," of Darmstadt. The Brothers Bruckner, of Coburg, are painting the scenery, after the designs of Herr Hofmann, of Vienna. The rehearsals will shortly commence. One peculiarity of this much-vaunted theatre is the form of the auditorium. This is not the usual oval, but a polygon, rounded off at the base. Then there are no tiers of boxes rising one above the other, and the stage is exceedingly large. Between the foot-lights and the stalls is a space called by Herr Wagner the "mystic abyss." In this the orchestra will be placed, out of sight of the spectators. The house will hold 1,500 persons. The Prince's box and the gallery are reserved by the Composer of the Future for his own guests.

CONCERTS VARIOUS.

THE ROYAL STANDARD SOCIETY gave a concert on Tuesday evening, January 26, at St James's Hall. The hall was crowded. Madame Donti sang with great taste; Mr Heywood (Theatre Royal, Covent Garden) gave "Come into the garden, Maud" and "Good-bye, sweetheart;" Mr Ch. J. Bishenden, who had a "most enthusiastic reception," sang "The Outlaw" and "Old Simon the cellerar" (encored); Mdme Marietta played a pianoforte solo, and the band a selection from Der Freischütz and a "Brazilian March."

MDME PUZZI, as early in the field as welcome, gave the first of three soirées on Friday, January 22nd. The Italian composers whose vocal works were interpreted by singers of various nations, were Rossini, Donizetti, Costa, Carulli, and Bragæ. The Germans were represented by Mozart and Wagner, the French by Gounod, and the English by Balfe, Cowen, and Ascher. The names of the artists were Mdlle Fanny Puzzi, Miss Purdy, Mdme Edna Hall, Signor Federici, Mr Bentham, and Mr Trelawny Cobham. Major Loughman, an accomplished amateur, also assisted, and was happy in the duet, with Mdme Edna Hall, "Crudel perche," which he sang con amore. Mr Bentham was also happy in his interpretation of a charming air from Balfe's Il Talismano, "Candido Fiore;" Miss Fanny Puzzi in an aria from Roberto Devereux; Miss Purdy in Mr Cowen's "It was a dream;" and Mr Trelawny Cobham in Ascher's popular romance, "Alice, where art thou?" which he, "as it were," has made "quite his own." The vocal music was "relieved" by a pianoforte fantasia on airs from Nicolai's Merry Wives of Windsor, composed and capitally played by Herr Wilhelm Ganz, and a charming harp study, composed and capitally played by Mr John Thomas. Herr Wilhelm Ganz accompanied the vocal music on the pianoforte; and Mdme Puzzi may be congratulated on brilliantly commencing the season of musical soirées.

ROYAL ALBERT HALL CONCERTS.—The next concert is to take place to-night—a Popular Ballad Night. Mdlle Levier, Miss Antoinette Sterling, Mr Sims Reeves (who will sing Blumenthal's "Message" and a serenade by Berthold Tours), and Mr Whitney are the vocalists; and Herr Wilhelmj, who created so great an impression on his re-appearance last week, is to play a concertstück by Dr Hiller, for the first time, and a chaconne (for violin alone) by Bach. Part Songs and madrigals by the Part Song Choir of the Royal Albert Hall Choral Society, under the direction of Mr Barnby, complete a very interesting programme. The next Orchestral Concert will take place on Tuesday, when several important works (notably Mendelssohn's Italian Symphony) will be performed. Herr Wilhelmj is to play a concerto by F. Hégar, for the first time, and his own arrangements of Wagner's "Album-blatt" and Chopin's "Notturno." Mdlle Johanna Levier and Mr Sims Reeves are to be the vocalists. The concert will be conducted, as usual, by Mr Barnby.

BERLIN.—The second part chosen by Herr Ernst, the most recent "Gast" at the Royal Operahouse, was the part of Walther in Die Meistersinger von Nürenberg, but he was not very successful in it. The other characters were efficiently sustained by Mad. Mallinger, Madlle Brandt, Herren Betz, Fricke, Schmidt, and Basse.—Lajolie Parfumeuse has been successfully produced at the Wallner-Theater.—The programme at the first Monday Concert (second series) given by Herren Hellmich and Engelhardt comprised Mendelssohn's D minor Trio, Hummel's D minor Septet, and Bach's G minor Fugue for Violin alone. The vocalist was Mdlle Langner, who sang songs by Handel, Dessauer, and Baumgarten.

Prayer.

(From "Another World.")

"Forget not the source from whence all blessings come."

While stating that the prayers said by girls after their early meal are short, I ought to have added that the same rule is followed with regard to children of both sexes.

We even vary our forms of worship and services to suit different ages. Before my reign adults and children went to the same places of worship, repeated the same prayers, and listened to the same discourses, most of which being perfectly unintelligible to those of tender years, the evils and inconveniences resulting from the practice were very great. The children, finding the routine irksome, the constrained decorum required of them during a time which seemed to them never ending (for the services were then very long) were painful in the extreme, though they were sometimes relieved by turning their thoughts in other directions, perhaps to subjects irrelevant if not opposed to the ostensible object of the meeting.

Thus pain and weariness became then and in after life naturally associated with the most sacred of duties, and generally those who at an early age had been obliged to attend most regularly to an unintelligible and irksome routine were in after life those who absented themselves most frequently from the place of worship. I have known some, and this will scarcely be credited, who from an early age had in obedience to their parents' commands attended church with what was to them painful and monotonous regularity, and who, as soon as they were old enough to leave the parental jurisdiction, never entered a place of worship again until the day of their death, so great had been their stifled repugnance, created by the unnatural surfeit which had been inflicted upon them.

This was not all: the repugnance thus engendered often extended even to the faith itself which the prayers and discourses had been intended to inculcate, and led the way in after life to doubt and disbelief.

There was another though a secondary evil, attendant upon these old formalities. In our climate, where children are very susceptible, it happened that when on rare occasions any striking observation attracted their attention, they would put questions very difficult for their parents or preceptors to answer.

The forms of worship and service are now adapted to three several ages and classes of intelligence. The first series is for children of from seven to ten years of age, the second for children from ten to sixteen, the third for adults. If the children, however, show any deficiency of intelligence, they are kept in the first or second series, though the stated age has been passed.

The discourses addressed to the young people are adapted to their age and intelligence, and ordinarily bear reference to their own passing actions, and consequently to their hours of play and study. They are intended to inculcate lessons of self-control, love for parents or associates, contentment, and the mode of showing gratitude for benefits received, by cultivating the faculties which God in His goodness has bestowed. The discourse often points out the mode of contending against any bad feelings that might possibly be awakened. They might be told, for instance, that if during play any dissatisfaction with their companions arose, and they felt they could not control themselves, they ought immediately to retire from the game, in order that their feelings might have the opportunity of returning to their proper channel, and on no account to urge anything against the supposed offender until they had advised with some friendly adult, or more especially a Character-diver.

PROVINCIAL.

HULL.—An evening concert took place on Friday, the 15th January, for the benefit of the Pavilion Fund of the Town Cricket Club, under the management of Messrs R. Smith, Chaseman, Remington, and Toogood. Several popular part-songs were given with effect, and were encored. A solo on the clarionet (Scotch airs by Lazarus), well played by Mr Fogarty, was encored, as well as Ascher's popular solo, "Alice, where art thou?" capitally played by Miss Wreghitt; and one of De Beriot's violin solos, by Mr C. Newton, was also encored. The concert, which was a great success, closed with Balfe's trio, "I'm not the Queen," and Bishop's popular glee, "Where art thou, beam of light?" Mr F. Bregazzi accompanied the vocal music on the pianoforte with tact and judgment.

LEICESTER.—The Leicester Evening News of January 19, says:—

"Mr Nicholson's concert last evening was a splendid success. We have rarely seen the Hall filled with so large an audience on a musical occasion. Mr Santley's songs drew the hearty applause of all present. If any feelings of disappointment at the absence of Mr Sims Reeves lingered in the mind of the audience we may safely say they vanished after Mr Lloyd had sung Mendelssohn's song, 'The Garland'—that is, if we may judge by the applause with which it was received. Madame Thaddeus Wells and Madame Poole are no strangers to a Leicester audience, and the efforts of both ladies were warmly acknowledged. Their performance was characterised by vocal pathos, earnestness, and brilliancy which were alike admirable. The instrumental part of the concert was excellent. Mr H. Nicholson was especially singled out for applause. The ever-pleasing song, Bishop's 'Lo! here the gentle lark,' sung by Mdme Wells, accompanied by Mr Nicholson on the flute, proved one of the gems of the evening. Mr Val. Nicholson's solos on the violin displayed a complete mastery over the instrument. Mr Sidney Naylor presided at the pianoforte. The band and chorus of the Amateur Anemoic Union performed with their usual ability."

TORQUAY.—Mr C. Oberthür and Mr C. Fowler's harp and pianoforte recital took place at the Bath Saloon on Saturday morning, the 23rd inst., when the following were given:—Mr Oberthür's Concertino for the harp—the orchestral parts to which, arranged for the piano, were played with taste and judgment by Mr Fowler, who next gave a sonata of his own composition, which, by its graceful subjects and clever "treatment," reflects great credit on the professor's high musical abilities. Next came the late Parish-Alvars' grand Fantasia, dedicated to Thalberg, played by Mr Oberthür, whose perfect execution and graceful performance of this difficult piece, as well as, afterwards, of the same composer's "Serenade," were greatly admired. Mr Fowler also played in his most finished style Beethoven's "Sonata Appassionata," for which he was warmly applauded. In two piano pieces—"Traumbold" and "Espagnola"—Mr Oberthür, their composer, had great success, as well as in his two harp solos, ("Meditation" and "La Cascade"), in his duet on Irish airs, and in two other very effective duets, "La prière" and "Lucrezia Borgia," with which the concert terminated. All these pieces gave the highest satisfaction. The Concertino, for harp, deserves particular notice, especially the effect which the solo movement produced on the audience, who acknowledged its beauty by spontaneous applause. The rooms were well attended. Those present, among whom were nearly all the lovers of the harp residing here, experienced a rare treat.

THE New York Herald spent 3,000 francs in telegraphing a report of the opening of the New Opera for the following morning's paper.

LEGHORN.—The season here began badly. The first opera was Les Huguenots, but it was given in so unsatisfactory a fashion that, after six performances, the season was abruptly brought to a close. The Theatre re-opened on the 16th inst., under a fresh management. The operas selected for representation were Lucrezia Borgia and Maria di Rohan.

BARMEN.—A capital performance of Schumann's Paradise and Peri lately took place here, and the Elberfelder Zeitung writes about Mdme Otto-Alvsleben's singing as follows:—"That Madame Otto-Alvsleben (of Dresden) was engaged to sing the music of the Peri, we consider a happy idea, and we do not know any dramatic singer whom we would have preferred. This Peri, without any real, sensual life, a graceful airy being, demands a voice of an exceptional character, and a thoroughly poetical conception on the part of the artist. Madame Otto-Alvsleben was excellent throughout. With her artistic singing, simple, yet full of expression and feeling, rich in happy nuances, technically perfect, with a voice full of sweetness and noble timbre, this artist realised our ideal of the Peri, and we shall be happy to have another opportunity of hearing her. The construction of the work gives but scarce opportunity for applause, but every one must have carried away a reminiscence of that lovely Peri, with her sweet, sorrowful tones, her passionate longing for happinese, and her sacred and solemn enthusiasm."

MUSIC IN NEW ZEALAND.

(From our Correspondent.)

Allen's Royal English Opera Company have been playing at Wanganni to excellent houses—a large number of the residents subscribing liberally to induce them to come. It is a curious fact that on this very spot, where Maories were fighting only four years ago, an orderly town should exist, and that a large opera company, whose nightly expenses must exceed, at least, fifty pounds, should be able to find paying audiences for ten nights. Miss Alice May's benefit was an immense success, and the company left immediately after, by the Manuwatu, for Wellington. The last night of the company's performance in Wellington was a night to be remembered. Miss Alice May received an ovation rarely accorded to any public favourite. The Fire Brigade, for whom she had sung at a benefit in aid of their sick fund, escorted her from the theatre to her hotel. The Brigade, headed by the Volunteer Artillery Band, carried banners and different coloured torches; and the effect, on a beautiful moonlight night, was, as may be imagined, charming. Thousands of people were in the streets, and the cheering was immense. As the procession passed the various hotels, where crowds of people were assembled on the balconies, there was waving of hats and "huzzaing." It was the first time such an event had taken place, and the crowd behaved in a becoming manner. A cynic, however—for there are such "things" to be found here—wrote a letter to the papers about "Operatic and other talent," and asked if the same thing would have been accorded to Thomas Carlyle if he should visit Wellington, &c. Some one took up the cudgels and replied as follows:—

"'A friend of Alice May' writes to us in very strong terms against the letter of a Cynic. He forgets, this friend says, that Alice May presented a very handsome gift to the Fire Brigade, for which there was not the slightest necessity; but she did so out of the pure kindness of heart; and Captain Moss and his men have merely paid her the graceful compliment of doing her honour in their own way, quite unsought by her—an honour which, in her modesty, she would have declined (as I know) had she been allowed. Everyone who knows Miss May will endorse what I now say, that with all her talent and bewitching ways, she has not a particle of conceit or affectation about her, either on or off the stage, and in this respect she shines above professionals generally, as a bright particular star."

The company proceed from Wellington to Christchurch, where they will probably meet Mdme Arabella Goddard, whose agent is now there making arrangements. G. B. A.

Wellington, October 29, 1874.

THE PROMISED NEW OPERA HOUSE.

We are glad to know that the scheme for the erection of a new Opera House on the Victoria Embankment may now be considered in a direct way of realisation. Since we described the project yesterday, we have learned that the proposal of Mr Mapleson for the site on the Embankment has been accepted by the Metropolitan Board of Works. The scheme in which Mr Mapleson and Sir Michael Costa are associated may therefore be expected to give to London an Opera House on a site almost unrivalled among great cities. The new Opera of Paris looks, indeed, upon gleaming white streets and brilliant crowds, but an Opera House with a river front, or with the Victoria Embankment for its river terrace, will be something almost unique. We do not know whether the increasing purification of the Thames will induce the swans ever again to become familiar with the river-way below the bridges; but if that should come to pass we cannot see how the spirit of æstheticism itself could suggest anything more harmonious and delightful than a lounge between the acts of an opera in a balcony looking on a moonlit river—for we sometimes have moonlight—with floating swans. One may be excused for indulging in such dreams in regard to the Thames and its modern condition below the bridges when we think of an Opera House standing near the sight of the dingy tenements and ricketty oozy wharves which used to overhang the muddy and splenetic stream only a few years ago. It is evident that, to make the Embankment a really valuable road and a means of relieving the traffic of the choking Strand, it is necessary to draw the public thither and familiarise them with the place by the power of some special attraction. An Opera House on the site now agreed upon would be as effective a means to that end as any conceivable; and were it for that reason only, we should welcome the enterprise. But we think a good deal of the regenerated river, made poetic and picturesque by the lordly pleasure-house of music on its bank.—Daily News.

MADAME PATEY IN PARIS.

It was on Thursday that the performances of The Messiah were resumed at the Cirque in the Champs Elysées. As we know, this fine artistic treat was got up for the benefit of a charitable institution, the House of the Providence Sainte-Marie, being given under the patronage of Madame la Maréchale de Mac-Mahon, who had found rare aid and devotion among several of the persons around her, such as the Comtesse de Boyas, the Marquise de Caraman, the Comtesse de Uribarren, the Viscomtesse de Courval, Mesdes Théodore Ducos, Hollander, Sabatier, etc. The vast Cirque had been decorated for the occasion with remarkable taste, and flowers had been lavished in all directions, the City of Paris having gracefully placed its conservatories at the service of those who got up the fête. It is superfluous to say that Madame la Maréchale assisted at the performance, which, moreover, derived an altogether unusual attraction from the presence, among the interpreters of Handel's masterpiece, of Mad. Patey, an English vocalist, as yet unknown in Paris, but for many years appreciated and admired in London as an oratorio singer.

Mad. Patey, whose husband, by the way, is an excellent musician, enjoys, on the other side of the Channel, an absolutely exceptional reputation, which, it is only just to say, strikes us as legitimate for more than one reason. She is now thirty-two, and made her first appearance in London some years ago at Mr Henry Leslie's Concerts, achieving a genuine success. Subsequently, when Mad. Sainton-Dolby, the wife of M. Sainton, the French violinist, retired from the profession, Mad. Patey inherited that lady's position at the Sacred Harmonic Society, and was engaged as first contralto by Sir Michael Costa. Since then she has sung most successfully at festivals and the Society's concerts, and acquired a high reputation. Not only has she given the public an opportunity of appreciating her grand style and her admirable voice in the works of Bach, Handel, and Mendelssohn, but Messrs Gounod, Julius Benedict, Macfarren, and Sullivan have written expressly for her a large number of compositions to which her incontestable talent has done full justice.

Mad. Patey's voice, a deep contralto, is of a marvellous pâte of rare quality and of irreproachable correctness. It possesses the rich, mellow, tone we formerly admired in that of Alboni. To these natural gifts, Mad. Patey joins acquired qualities which render her an artist of the first class. At her very first air, "O Thou that tellest," the public understood with whom they had to deal, but it was more especially in her second air: "He shall feed His flock," that Mad. Patey's success assumed unexpected proportions.

The great artist gave this admirable air admirably. Not only did she sing it with grand sentiment and grand style, but she phrased it deliciously, and marked the fine gradations of light and shade with exquisite taste, displaying a feeling of profound emotion which was promptly communicated to the audience, evoking from them enthusiastic applause and a unanimous encore. It was, we may truly say, a perfect revelation. It is a remarkable fact, also, that this lady, a foreigner, pronounces and articulates French with a degree of steadiness, suppleness, and distinctness, with which we should be very glad to meet among our own countrywomen. In short, Mad. Patey's success was complete and thoroughly legitimate. ARTHUR POUGIN.

MILAN.—The second opera of the season at the Scala was Meyerbeer's Prophète, with Signora Edelsberg, Signori Bulterini and Maini, in the leading parts. The chorus and orchestra had been well drilled by the energetic conductor, Sig. Faccio, and the work went off very satisfactorily. Gustavo Wasa is still in active rehearsal. The principal characters will be sustained by Signora Mariani-Masi, Signori Bolis, Pantaleoni, Maini, and Marchetti.—Giroflé-Girofla has been produced with the Lupi and Bergonzoni company at the Teatro Dal Verme. It was well played, especially by Signore Frigerio, Geminiani, Soucini, and Sig. Bergonzoni, and admirably put on the stage. Though the music is pronounced inferior to that of La Fille de Mad. Angot, and the libretto branded as absurd and vapid, this fresh creation of M. Lecocq's will probably run for some time to come.

WAIFS.

The after-Christmas season has begun well for music at the Crystal Palace.

Herr Gade has accepted a commission to write for the next Birmingham Festival.

Mdlle Johanna Levier will appear at one of the Philharmonic Society's concerts this season.

Auber's monument is to be erected facing the grand avenue of Père la Chaise at a cost of 6,000 francs.

M. Ambroise Thomas will preside at the grand international competition of choirs, &c, to be held at Amiens in May next.

M. Amsel, a Polish tenor, who has the reputation of being de la première force in Rossini's music, has arrived in London.

We understand that a very promising young soprano will make her début at Mr Henry Leslie's opening concert next month.

Mr Henry Leslie has been placed in the Commission of the Peace by the Lord Lieutenant of the county in which his estate is situated.

Mdlle Victoria Bunsen has returned from her tour in Sweden, and is to be the vocalist at the concert given in the Aquarium, at Brighton, to-day.

M. Alexandre Billet, one of the most justly-esteemed of our resident foreign pianists, has already announced his annual, and always welcome, recitals, which will be held, as usual, in St George's Hall.

The season of "mince pies and mistletoe" is drawing to a close. What shall we do when the lip-salve of the last ten days is not to be had? Doctors will be of no avail: they cannot minister to a lip disused.

Mdlle Ida Corani, according to a telegram received from Catania, the birthplace of Bellini, met with the most brilliant success on Monday evening, the 26th inst., in the part of Amina, in the opera of La Sonnambula.

Dr Sloman's cantata, Supplication and Praise, which was performed in June last at the Royal Albert Hall, London, will be shortly performed, with orchestral accompaniments, by the Melbourne Choral Society, Derby.

Miss Emilie Glover, a daughter of Professor Glover, of Dublin, and the accomplished pupil of Mr John Thomas, at the Royal Academy of Music (London), is appointed harpist to the Alexandra Palace. A better choice could not be made.

Miss Purdy, who was the vocalist for the third of the "Musical Evenings," at St George's Hall, sang the "Maid of Athens" by Gounod and a canzonetta (unpublished) by Dr Sellé, "If music be the food of love."—Her sympathetic and finished rendering of the new air to the old words won for the lady a very spirited recall.

The next musical evening of the German Athenæum promises to be of particular interest, as may be gathered from the names of the following composers—Haydn, Handel, Schumann, Mozart, Schubert, and Ferdinand David, whose works will be given on the occasion, interpreted by MM. Paul David, Max Vogel, Zerbini, Daubert, Oscar Beringer, and Ainsworth.

Audiences are often the best critics. At the Fifth Avenue Theatre, the other evening, during the performance of Pygmalion and Galatea, we overheard the following conversation in a private box:—

Lady—"Mr Harkins seems very cold towards his statue-bride."

Gentleman—"Yes; it wouldn't take much to turn him into a statue."

Lady—"I don't know that. It takes years to turn a stick into a stone."

Mr R. Jeffs, the well-known furrier, of Regent Street (who, by-the-bye, is especially well known to all the lyric artists who visit Russia), has been selected by the lords of the Admiralty to supply the furs required for the ensuing Arctic Expedition. Those used during the last four expeditions sent out in search of Sir John Franklin, and the furs required during the war in the Crimea were also furnished by Mr Jeffs.

A provincial, dining at a restaurant in Paris last week, sat near a very respectable-looking grey-headed person, with whom he entered into conversation. "To whom have I the honour of speaking?" said he. "I am the Lord Mayor of London," said the venerable diner with great simplicity. "I came over to assist at the first representation at the New Opera." "I have seen that in the papers," replied the other, intimating that this new acquaintance was in luck. "Mon Dieu," replied the soi-disant Lord Mayor, "I pay for my place like others. I have bought a box, and there are three of us." After a short silence he resumed—"I was about to add that I would willingly sell the fourth place." "For how much?" said the other. "Two hundred francs; would you like it?" "I should think so," said the other; "how much I thank you, my lord." "Very well," was the reply, "ask this evening for No. 4. Avant Scène, and give me the money. I have but just time to dress." The provincial paid the money, and has since made a complaint to the police.

A violin concerto by Hégar, never yet heard in this country, will be played by Herr Wilhelmj at the Royal Albert Hall on Tuesday next, when the accomplished artist will also introduce his own arrangement, for violin and orchestra, of Wagner's Album-blatt.

By the death of the Rev. Henry East Havergal, Vicar of Copie, the Church has lost another member of a highly-gifted family, three of whom, while serving in the ranks of the English clergy, always continued to devote themselves to music, and other artistic pursuits. Mr Havergal, who graduated at New College, Oxford, in 1842, became chaplain of his college and of Christ Church, an office which he resigned in 1847 on his appointment to Copie. For the church of this village he built an organ with his own hands, which possessed the peculiarity that it was an F organ, Mr Havergal holding that, as the ordinary compass of the human voice only extends to F, the compass of the organ ought to stop at the same note. On this instrument he carried out many experiments, and he also played it during Divine service. He further constructed a chiming apparatus, and was in fact the bell-ringer and organist, as well as the parson of the little church. Before service he was in the habit of chiming the bells; he would then play a voluntary, and proceed to the reading-desk, and afterwards would return to the keyboard to accompany the hymns and canticles. His enthusiasm for music was very great, and for some time he was conductor of a musical society at the neighbouring town of Bedford. He possessed a natural alto voice, and as a proof of the varied range of his musical capabilities, it may be mentioned that, in a trial of Crotch's oratorio, Palestine, he played the double bass and sang the alto part in the choruses at the same time. He also played the trumpet. In 1816, before leaving Oxford, Mr Havergal published two editions of George Wither's "Hymns of the Church;" he also published from the original MS. a copy of Tallis's preces, and several other musical works.

Raff's new Symphony is not the equal of the Im Walde or the Lenore, although the second movement is the best scherzo he has yet written. The first movement is also fine and its climax grand, impressive and original, but the subjects and their treatment in the two last movements are somewhat common-place and familiar, although not in any case laying the composer open to the imputation of a direct plagiarism. A mysterious pizzicato melody ushers in the first movement, and this same theme is afterwards developed to some extent in bowed passages upon the violins and 'celli, while the basses maintain the pizzicato figure. The second subject is announced by short phrases alternating between the "wind" and strings, and severe tax is laid upon the players on the wood, but in this case it only served to display their thorough excellence. Some passages for flute in descending trills are novel in idea and very effective. We have above alluded to the finish of this movement, which shows unflagging spirit and magnificent orchestration. Though not called a scherzo, the second movement is so in fact, and in nature of subject and manner of scoring bears considerable similarity to the one in the Midsummer Night's Dream music. Here, too, Raff is very exacting in his demands upon the "wood," to which are allotted the same difficult florid passages that are first given by the strings. There are what may be called two trios to this scherzo, although they are not so divided in the score. Both are melodious and delicate in conception, but the second for the flutes, clarionets, oboes and bassoons is the more generally pleasing. The third movement is a funeral march, which is scarcely as solemn and impressive as the nature of the subject would lead one to expect, though some fine effects are obtained towards the end by muting the violins. By far the weakest part of the work is the last movement, where the composer seems to have for a time exhausted his invention and to have fallen back upon his memory. As a whole, the symphony is undoubtedly a fine piece of writing, and had it been written by anyone but Raff, would have fairly led us to expect great things of its author, but he who has written the Im Walde has reached a perilous altitude, which only great genius will enable him to maintain.—Arcadian.

Richmond (America).—The "Kellogg Opera Troupe" have been drawing large audiences to the Theatre with M. Gounod's Faust. Mdme Van Zandt—says the Richmond Enquirer of December 23—sustained the part of Marguerite magnificently. Her voice differs in many respects from Miss Kellogg's, principally in its metallic element. It is powerful, well cultivated and full of expression, while her acting is thoroughly artistic. Miss Beaumont was Siebel, Mr Peak, Mephistopheles, Mr Carleton, Valentin, and Mr Maas, Faust. Mr Maas—writes the same journal—again won laurels, and well he deserved them. His pure strong tenor was at its best last night, and he fully established his ability to grasp the highest operatic honours. The Daily Dispatch, writing about Mr Maas as Lionel (Martha), says: "His is the best tenor voice we have ever heard in this city;" and the Enquirer: "That he fully established himself as a favourite with the public. He has a superb voice, true as steel, of magnificent compass, and he manages it with perfect ease."

THE VOICE & SINGING

BY

ADOLFO FERRARI.

THE FORMATION AND CULTIVATION OF THE VOICE FOR SINGING

Price 12s.

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, REGENT STREET, W.

"The remarkable qualities of this book are the author's freedom from conventional trammels, the strong sense of his opinions, and the novelty yet evident soundness of his precepts; his work has consequently come into general use as a manual of vocal instruction."—Daily News.

DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE,

For invigorating and enriching the voice, and removing affections of the throat.

DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE is universally acknowledged to be the most valuable remedy for sore throat, hoarseness and relaxed throat. It should always be taken before singing or reciting, as it strengthens the vocal organs. It is most extensively prescribed by the faculty for the throat and voice. Dr Lewis of Basingstoke says he finds them most efficacious, and in Dr Copland's Dictionary of Practical Medicine (Longman & Co.), they are strongly recommended at pages 872 and 1492. They are used by all the greatest vocalists and orators in Europe, and have been established over a quarter of a century. Testimonials from Patti, Grisi, Lablache, Santley, &c. Sold in boxes, 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. by all Chemists throughout the United Kingdom and the Colonies.

"HER I LOVE."

BALLAD.

By WILFORD MORGAN.

Price 4s.

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

"This composition is, in all respects, worthy of its predecessor, 'My sweetheart when a boy.' It is simple in structure, and within the means of every amateur; but its music is pleasing, and thoroughly appropriate to the words. No doubt the song will soon win a share of public favour."—Musical World.

"Mr Wilford Morgan's song, 'Her I love,' will be certain to find many admirers for the musicianly instinct which pervades it, as well as for the happy manner in which the very pretty melody has been laid out for the voice."—Morning Post.

"LITTLE BIRDIE, SING TO ME."

SONG.

Words by Miss S. P. HOWELL.

Music by WILFORD MORGAN,

Price 4s.

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street.

"A naive little song for a young girl is 'Little birdie, sing to me,' composed by Wilford Morgan. There is a melodious ring in this song that will please the ear."—Graphic.

"Mr Wilford Morgan's latest production, 'Little birdie, sing to me,' apparently aims at simplicity of melody and accompaniment, and has happily hit it."—Morning Post.

"'LITTLE BIRDIE, SING TO ME.'—Mr Wilford Morgan has just published another very pleasing song under the above title. It is a very fresh, bright melody, which might almost be signed Mendelssohn; and the accompaniment, while sufficient to sustain the voice, is extremely easy."—Era.

"A charming song, full of melody and sweetness, without being difficult to singers of moderate compass."—Hornet.

"From Messrs Duncan Davison & Co. we have a song by the well-known vocalist, Mr Wilford Morgan, 'Little birdie, sing to me,' a remarkably good and characteristic setting of some pretty, simple words."—Echo.

"A tuneful and pleasing ballad for a voice of average compass, effectively harmonised, although the pianoforte accompaniment presents but very few difficulties to the performer. 'Little birdie' contains all the elements of popularity, and should eventually become as popular as the composer's 'My sweetheart when a boy.'"—Sunday Times.

SUNG BY MDLLE CARLOTTA PATTI.

A peine ai-je vu le printemps
Couvrir dix fois de leur feuillage
Les vieux saules de nos étangs,
Que, sans pitié pour mon jeune âge,
Dieu m'a ravi le guide aimé
Qui me prodiguait ses tendresses!
Je pleure son regard charmé!
Je ne reçois plus ses caresses!

Ainsi parlait, en gémissant,
Une orpheline désolée;
Mais un bel ange, l'embrassant,
Lui dit, d'une voix inspirée:
"Ne pleure plus et sois ma sœur
Ma mère sera notre mère,
Et tu verras que du bonheur
Il en est encor sur la terre!"

SIR STERNDALE BENNETT.

(From "The Times," Feb. 2.)

One of the most gifted musicians ever born in this country—William Sterndale Bennett—died yesterday, about noon, at his residence in St John's Wood Road. He was born at Sheffield on the 13th of April, 1816. His father, Mr Robert Bennett, was organist at a church in that town, and the son's earliest days were passed as a choir-boy. Very soon, however, his extraordinarily precocious capacity raised general attention; and he was sent to our Royal Academy of Music for instruction. At the Academy he studied under Dr Crotch, Mr W. H. Holmes, Mr Cipriani Potter, and other professors of note. Although, at first, considered a rather dilatory scholar, he rapidly attained distinction. His symphony in E flat at once proclaimed his exceptional ability; and, not very long subsequently, his pianoforte concerto in D minor interested Mendelssohn so greatly that he desired to be introduced to the promising young musician. After progressing more and more in the same path, and when he had composed various works of immediately acknowledged excellence, Bennett was invited to perform at the Philharmonic Concerts, which at that period were the direct road to professional eminence. He played his second concerto (E flat), and, a year later, his third (C minor), each with brilliant success. From this time his career became assured; and as he was one of the finest pianists of his time—the nearest, in fact, to Mendelssohn that we can remember—his services were in constant request. He then went to Germany, and, at Leipsic, soon won the close intimacy of Mendelssohn and Schumann. How these remarkable men influenced his subsequent career is well known. Previous to his departure from England Bennett had obtained general acceptance through the pianoforte concertos we have named, his overtures, Parasina and The Naiades—both masterpieces—and other works. At Leipsic he composed his finest overture, The Wood Nymphs, which, on his return to England, was given without delay by the Philharmonic Society, meeting with a reception no less cordial than had greeted it in the Saxon capital and other parts of Germany. Thenceforth his career was one of uninterrupted success. From a pupil he had ripened into a master, and his supremacy as an English pianist and composer was unanimously admitted. The works he has since produced are so well known to English musicians and amateurs that it would be superfluous to catalogue them in detail. Among the most remarkable, however, must be mentioned the fourth pianoforte concerto (F minor); the Caprice (E major), for pianoforte, with orchestra; a sonata dedicated to Mendelssohn (F minor); a fantasia, so called, though in form just as much a sonata as the other, dedicated to Schumann (A major); a cantata, entitled The May Queen, composed for the Leeds Festival of 1858, and now all over the country a household word; The Woman of Samaria, his chef d'œuvre in the sacred style, written for the Birmingham Festival; his seventh symphony (in G minor), performed only last Saturday week, amid general applause, at the Crystal Palace Concerts, under the direction of Mr Manns; his overture, Paradise and the Peri, a poem, if ever there was one, in music; and last, not least, his beautiful pianoforte sonata, The Maid of Orleans, composed expressly for Madame Arabella Goddard, which, in her absence, has been performed by Dr Hans von Bülow, Mr Franklin Taylor, Mr Walter Macfarren, and other distinguished professors. Bennett has left a great number of compositions in manuscript, which, as fastidious as Mendelssohn himself, he kept by him for revision at leisure—a leisure which never came. He always looked at his art from a serious point of view, and did nothing to conciliate what is spoken of as "the popular taste of the day." The intimate friend of Mendelssohn and Schumann, he emulated their example, though he had done quite enough to assert his right to belong to the family of genuine artists before he made the acquaintance of either. Bennett was never, as we find so often stated, a pupil of Mendelssohn's. The two met at Düsseldorf and Leipsic on equal terms, and Mendelssohn esteemed our English composer just as highly as our English composer esteemed Mendelssohn. Of this there are existing proofs in the great German musician's own printed words—instance the friendly and noble testimonial when Bennett was a candidate for the musical professorship at the Edinburgh University. Schumann's opinion of our countryman may be read, over and over again, in his "Gesammelte Schriften, über Musik und Musiker," especially when, criticizing The Three Diversions (pianoforte duets), he writes:—

"Aber jener Engländer ist unter allen Fremden der deutschen Theilnahme am würdigsten, ein geborner Künstler, wie selbst Deutschland wenige aufzuweisen."

The distinctions conferred upon Bennett in the country of his birth, as simply recognitions of his merits, are various. In his early boyhood a chorister at King's College, Cambridge, he was eventually (1868) appointed Musical Professor at Cambridge University, where he also graduated as Musical Doctor, and some years after as Master of Arts. In 1870 he was made D.C.L. at Oxford, and the year following knighted by her Majesty the Queen at Windsor, in company with Julius Benedict, his worthy compeer. For eleven years—from 1856—he directed the Philharmonic Concerts, and composed his admirable overture, Paradise and the Peri, for the occasion of their jubilee, celebrated in St James's Hall. In 1868 he succeeded the late Mr Lucas as Principal of the Royal Academy of Music, the fortunes of which he did more than any who had preceded him to sustain. In fact, his artistic career, humbly as it began, was to him an uninterrupted succession of honours. He deserved them well. Perhaps there never was a man in our time more universally liked and esteemed than William Sterndale Bennett; certainly there never was one who has done more to make English musical art respected abroad as well as at home.

About noon yesterday, at his residence in St John's Wood, died William Sterndale Bennett, Knight, Mus. Doc., M.A., D.C.L., Cambridge Professor and Principal of the Royal Academy of Music. By reason of this event the universal art of music mourns. Sterndale Bennett was no ordinary English master, such as the many who, having gained an insular reputation, never succeed in winning higher and broader honours. To a great extent, he was our representative man before the world of music. His name and genius have been known and respected on the Continent almost as many years as in his native land; and when the news spreads through the art circles of Europe and America that he who wrote the Naiades, the Wood Nymphs, and the pianoforte concerto in F minor, is no more, it will be said with regret that "a prince and a great man hath fallen." But if the sad event of yesterday cannot fail to arouse emotions of sorrow among amateurs all the world over, how ought it to be regarded here? English music—nay, England herself—is indeed the poorer for the loss of Sterndale Bennett. We have not had many such as he of whom to boast. We can point to very few who, in the grand procession of masters, have trodden closely in the footsteps of the foremost, and there have been fewer still whom Fate has allowed to win their rightful share of the world's honour. Even while our sense of loss is keen, we would not exaggerate the worth of the departed, and, when it is said that English music has just received a heavy blow, the uttered words are but simple truth.

Sterndale Bennett's career, looked at in connection with the many discouraging circumstances against which an English musician contends, is a remarkable instance of the power of real ability to make its way. Our dead master came of a musical family and respectable parentage, but hardly could anything have been less hopeful than his start in life. Mother and father were taken from him in infancy, the loss of the father being the more serious because, as an organist of repute in Sheffield, he was fitted to watch over the musical development of his son. But the orphan boy was not left friendless, and at eight years of age—that is to say, in 1824—Sterndale Bennett became attached, as a chorister of King's, to the University which now laments the loss of her distinguished Professor. His musical genius rapidly asserted itself; and those who were interested in him saw that the lad had gifts only needing proper care in order to attain greatness. Hence his removal to the Royal Academy of Music, then a young institution, presided over by Dr Crotch, and giving much promise of good by its activity and success. Sterndale Bennett was now fairly started on his career, and some of those who remember him under these circumstances are fond of calling to mind the bright happy, high-spirited youth, already looked upon as the hope of English music. Bennett was no sluggard during his time of pupilage. Possessed by the spirit of art to that degree which only musicians know, he wrought incessantly, work after work coming from his busy pen, as though his resources were inexhaustible. How far, in this respect, he emulated the brilliant genius to whose artistic influence he laid himself open so unreservedly, it boots not to inquire. At any rate, these were Bennett's golden days—days in which honourable ambition fed upon successful achievement, and life seemed a fair and happy thing. The works produced at this early period are among the best he gave to the world, and by them, rather than by later compositions, his genius is known. As instances may be cited the pianoforte concertos in C minor and F minor, the overtures to the Naiades and Wood Nymphs, and the Capriccio in E for pianoforte and orchestra. These things, and others more in number than can be mentioned here, marked young Bennett for distinction above his fellows, and it was with the best credentials that he travelled to Germany in 1836 on an artistic tour, for which the "ways and means" had been supplied by a liberal and discerning amateur. This visit to the land of the great masters marked an epoch in Bennett's life. Through it he came in contact with Mendelssohn, and began a friendship which death alone could interrupt, and to it was owing the speedy repute he gained among Continental amateurs. There is something very charming in the genial, affectionate welcome found by the young Englishman in the highest musical circles in Germany, and, above all, in Mendelssohn's almost brotherly kindness. No doubt the illustrious master felt flattered by the family likeness of Bennett's music to his own, but not Mendelssohn only stretched out a cordial hand. Robert Schumann was then editing the Neue Zeitschrift für Musik, and when, at the beginning of 1837, he wanted to present his readers with a new year's gift, he gave them a sketch of Sterndale Bennett. The great and gentle spirit of Schumann went out unreservedly to the youthful wanderer from the "unmusical country," and alike for the sake of a beautiful testimony borne by one artist to another, for the sake of the writer, and out of regard for the memory of the man he honoured, we must reproduce his words. The translation is that of "M. E. von G.":

"After much deliberation as to what new-year's gift I could present to the readers of the Neue Zeitschrift für Musik—in addition to the compliments of the season—that should secure their good opinion, I have come to the conclusion that I can do nothing better than introduce them to some pleasant acquaintance. The man I have in my mind is no Beethoven, enveloped in endless contests; no Berlioz, preaching revolution with hero's voice, amid universal terror and destruction. On the contrary, he is a person of a quiet, amiable nature, who, whatever tumults may be raging, occupies himself in his own work, like some astronomer in a lonely observatory watching the course of events and investigating the secrets of nature. His name is William Sterndale Bennett, and he is the countryman and partly the namesake of Shakespeare.

"The arts of music and poetry are surely not so antagonistic that we need wonder that that famous country, which has given us Shakespeare and Byron, should also produce a good musician. The old prejudice which believed it impossible has been already shaken by Field, Onslow, Potter, Bishop, and others; and now Sterndale Bennett has given it a harder blow than ever. Providence has watched over him from his cradle. . . . How far this development was promoted by the careful instruction he received at the Royal Academy of Music, in London, under masters like Crotch and Cipriani Potter, and by his own indefatigable studies, I know not; I only know that out of this chrysalis has burst a truly glorious butterfly, fluttering through the summer air, now lighting on this flower and now on that, and leaving us to follow with eager eyes and outstretched hands. A soaring spirit like this could not be contented to remain on its native earth without desiring to behold the land where its two greatest predecessors, Mozart and Beethoven, first saw the light. And thus it has come to pass that the favourite of the London public, and the pride of musical England, is residing with us.

"As to the character of Bennett's compositions, no one can fail to be struck at first sight by their strong family likeness to those of Mendelssohn. There is the same beauty of form, the same poetic depth of clearness, the same ideal purity, the same divine power of impressing the hearer. And yet there is a distinction. It is even more evident in their playing than in their compositions. The Englishman excels in delicacy and finished detail; Mendelssohn in energy and grasp of the entire scope of the piece. The one is as delicate in the gradations of his softest pianos as the other is powerful and inexhaustible in his glorious fortes. Here we are rivetted by the divine expression of a single countenance; there we seem to be looking into one of Raffaelle's backgrounds studded with hundreds of sweet cherub faces. And their compositions present somewhat similar contrasts. While Mendelssohn gives in fantastic outlines all the wild revelry of a Midsummer Night's Dream, Bennett's imagination was aroused by the Merry Wives of Windsor. The one spreads before us the slumbering ocean in all its boundless expanse; the other fondly lingers by the softly rippling lake, with the moonbeams quivering on its surface.

"I have still much to say on this interesting topic—how these and similar pieces are mere trifles by the side of his larger works—such as his six symphonies, his three pianoforte concertos, his six orchestral overtures—to Parasina, the Näiads, &c.; how he knows all Handel by heart; how he can play all Mozart's operas on the piano, so as to bring them bodily before your eyes. All this and much more I could tell; but here he is himself! I can keep him off no longer; he has been looking over my shoulder for ever so long, and keeps asking, 'What are you writing there?' 'Dear old fellow! if you only knew what I have been saying!'"

Introduced in such glowing and affectionate terms, what wonder that Bennett and his music were warmly received. Several of his more important works were performed at the Gewandhaus Concerts in Leipsic, then under Mendelssohn's direction, whilst, as pianist not less than as composer, the young Englishman obtained the most flattering recognition. But perhaps the best measure of the impression made then, and subsequently upon the professors and amateurs of Germany, is supplied by the fact that, in 1853, when the conductorship of the Gewandhaus fell vacant, Bennett was invited to the post. The significance of this can hardly be appreciated by Englishmen, who are accustomed to see foreigners in the high places of music, but among the Germans it would be regarded as almost a phenomenal honour. Returning to England after the successful visit of 1836, Bennett soon settled down to the ordinary work of a professor, composing, performing, and teaching with equal success. But he was destined to an ultimate position in harmony with the richness of his gifts; and when, in 1844, he became a candidate for the Chair of Music in the University of Edinburgh, the first upward step was taken. True, the wise men of Modern Athens rejected his claims, and preferred another candidate, about whom it is needless to speak; but the contest brought Bennett prominently forward, and elicited from Mendelssohn, then in the zenith of his fame, a testimonial of priceless value. Whatever opinion the great master had put into deeds at Leipsic, he here put into words, and it was not the smallest of Sterndale Bennett's distinctions that such men as Schumann and Mendelssohn laid the homage of their admiration at his feet. Twelve years passed, during which our master, though not composing with the ardour of an earlier time, led a busy life; and then came the first of a crowd of honours. The Music Chair at Cambridge, vacated by the death of Dr Walmisley, was offered to Sterndale Bennett, and so it happened that the chorister boy of King's in 1826 became thirty years later the musical head of the University. Nor did this distinction come alone. After Herr Wagner's disastrous campaign in 1855 as conductor of the Philharmonic Society's Concerts, it was found needful to place the bâton in other hands, and to whom could the directors more naturally turn than to the chief English musician of the day? Dr Bennett accepted the post, and held it till 1868, when he made way for Mr Cusins. How far his reign was a success, and in what degree he brought to the discharge of his duties the mingled strength and delicacy of a perfect chef d'orchestre, are questions which, if propounded, would receive a variety of answers. True it is, assuredly, that in nice perception of a composer's meaning, and in sympathetic appreciation of the methods by which it was conveyed, few conductors could equal Sterndale Bennett. He may have lacked—nay, he did lack—the firmness, energy, and power of command that enable a chef d'orchestre to animate every subordinate with his own spirit; but, assuming that these merits could not be found united, he at least possessed the more essential. In 1858 Yorkshire recognized its now distinguished son by inviting him to preside over a grand festival at Leeds, and there was produced that beautiful and graceful work which, under the name of The May Queen, ranks among the classics of music. With this chef d'œuvre the career of Sterndale Bennett as a composer may be said to have reached its highest point. He did not, like Rossini, after Guillaume Tell, lay down his pen, but he had none the less done his devoir, and won his highest honours as an art-creator. In 1862, Dr Bennett composed the work which represented English music at the opening of the International Exhibition, the words being a poem by Tennyson—"Uplift a Thousand Voices"; and in the same year he co-operated with the late Canon Kingsley in the Ode performed at the installation of the Duke of Devonshire as Chancellor of his University. The remainder of Dr Bennett's career is less noticeable for public work than for an accumulation of distinctions. In 1869, Cambridge enrolled him among her Masters of Arts, the Royal Academy having, a year previously, placed him at its head, in succession to Mr Lucas. Oxford subsequently made him a D.C.L., and on March 24th, 1871, her Majesty the Queen bestowed upon him the honour of knighthood. It must not be supposed, however, that all this time the pen of the composer of the May Queen was idle. For the Birmingham Festival of 1867 Dr Bennett wrote his only oratorio, The Woman of Samaria—a work none the less full of beautiful music because it failed to achieve popular distinction. That the Woman of Samaria is not free from errors of judgment may be conceded, and yet leave much that some day or other will secure higher appreciation than it has hitherto obtained. The 24th of March, 1871, was a proud day in the life of the Sheffield organist's son; but a prouder, perhaps, was the 7th of April, 1872, when, in St James's Hall, from the hands of the Attorney-General—now Lord Coleridge—while the élite of musical London watched and applauded, Sir Sterndale Bennett received an address announcing that a biennial musical scholarship had been founded in his name. Hundreds who were present will now recall the scene, and once more behold the slight nervous frame of the honoured master as the work of his life was thus crowned and consummated. In a measure, this was Sterndale Bennett's farewell; and, though none knew the actual solemnity of the occasion, the speech of the Attorney-General was an elegy as well as an eulogium. Unwittingly Sir J. D. Coleridge summed up a life, when, referring to the limited repute of English composers, he said:—"It has been the just good fortune of Sir Sterndale Bennett to put an end to this somewhat provincial character of English music, and to bring it about that the name and works of an English musician shall be known and honoured and admired beyond the limits of the empire, and amongst other great and cultivated nations; and since the day when he first went to Leipsic, at twenty years of age, carrying with him the overture to the Naiades, to which we have just listened with pleasure, up to the present hour, his fame has gone on increasing day by day, until it has assumed the solid and proud proportions which it is no less an act of justice than of pleasure for us to acknowledge."

Here, too, we must quote the felicitous words with which the Attorney-General accompanied the presentation. Referring to the testimonial, he said:—"Take it, keep it, treasure it, hand it down to your posterity, to keep alive the memory of this day when you and I alike are gone to our rest; to keep fresh the recollection of the admiration we feel for the man of genius, the respect and honour we feel for the great artist, and the affectionate regard and esteem in which we hold an excellent and honourable man." With the applause which confirmed these words ringing in his ears Sir Sterndale Bennett retired from public view; and though he worked on nearly to the end—composing his beautiful sonata, The Maid of Orleans, for example—his career may be said to have closed with that grand proof of esteem and admiration.

We do not assume here and now to gauge the genius of the departed musician, nor to discuss the reasons which might be assigned for the comparative non-productiveness of his later years. Granted, as regards the second point, that Sir Sterndale Bennett's ripe manhood did not fulfil the brilliant hopes of his youth, it is not for us to pry into causes which may have been absolutely personal to himself. Rather, at this time especially, should we encourage a feeling of gratitude for the many things of beauty with which the deceased master enriched his art, and for the proof his career gives that merit, even in one who never asserts himself, is sure to meet with its reward. Sir Sterndale Bennett was no hunter after popularity. He not ever anxious to keep himself before the public eye, seeking rather to avoid it with an earnestness well nigh culpable. All the stronger for this is the testimony borne by the honours lavished upon him. Of his ultimate place in music it would be rash to speak with confidence. The time may be at hand when that which has hitherto been accounted a composer's strength will be set down as his weakness, through a reversal of the canons of art; in which case Sterndale Bennett, as he flourished with his friend Mendelssohn, will suffer with him. Anyhow, we who were so lately his contemporaries value the delicate fancy, the graceful expression, and rich culture of Sterndale Bennett's muse. We, at least, shall keep and cherish his works as the productions of a richly-gifted man, and when, in a few days, all musical England, in body or in spirit, stands at the side of his grave, the "Requiescat in pace" will apply only to the dust which returns to dust, for, while a love of genuine music exists, so long will Sterndale Bennett live and move amongst us.

We take the following, àpropos of the late Sterndale Bennett, from the Figaro of February 6th:—

The death of Sir William Sterndale Bennett will cause a feeling of the deepest grief throughout the whole world of music. An Englishman by birth and education, a composer of sterling merit, perhaps the best native writer we ever possessed, and a musician of the highest order, it is tolerably safe to say that his name will ever be associated with that of English music. Like many men of true genius, Sterndale Bennett has been the architect of his own fortunes. * * * * * * * * * *

Of his many works it is unnecessary to speak in detail. His symphonies, his trios, sonatas, and other chamber music—his pianoforte concertos (which, since the departure of Arabella Goddard, one of the most ardent disciples and admirers of Bennett, and a lady to whom English music owes a deep debt of gratitude), are known to musicians of every country. * * * * Equally unnecessary is it to speak of his overtures; the Naiades, the Wood Nymphs, Parasina, and his last, the poetic Fantasia overture, Paradise and the Peri. * * * Bennett never composed an opera; but his oratorio, The Woman of Samaria, and his cantata, The May Queen, have long been accepted as works of the very highest order.

His personal virtues and his capacity for drawing towards him the hearts of all who knew him are well known. His great gifts and exceptional talent as composer and executant commanded the respect both of amateurs and musicians; his many pupils had for him a respect and adoration bordering almost upon idolatry, while his intimate acquaintances, more numerous in England and Germany than those who knew him not would consider possible, will lament the death of a true friend, and of one of the most remarkable men of the age. In the words of Tom Moore, Sterndale Bennett truly was

"One who, in life, where'er he moved,
Drew after him the hearts of many."

His long labouring in the cause of English music needs no mention. In early years few men worked harder; his numerous compositions attest the industry of his youthful days, and their great popularity is sufficient to tell of their worth. Refined, graceful, melodious, and bearing the stamp of their author's strong individuality, the compositions of Sterndale Bennett, many years ago, obtained for him the richly-earned title of the "English Mendelssohn." His seven years' work as Principal of the Royal Academy of Music commenced at an age at which a successful and popular composer, a man full of dignities and honours, might with reason have deemed that the time had come for rest and retirement, shows his sterling love for English music and his earnest desire to raise the tone of art in his native land. When next we hear the incomparable music which he has set to Paradise and the Peri, we can comprehend the sigh of relief to the wearied composer, as the Peri seems to speak the words:—

"Joy, joy, for ever! my task is done;
The gates are pass'd, and heaven is won!"

Sterndale Bennett is now laid to his rest. The mortal man has gone, but his works, which are immortal, will remain to remind us of our friend. For long the premier musician of England, we now must seek for another to fill his place, and find him if we can. Sterndale Bennett died as he had lived—"in harness." Until his last illness prostrated him, his work at the Royal Academy of Music was carried on with all the vigour and industry of youth. Within the last two years he has enriched the repertory of chamber music with a sonata, which has excited the admiration of even professed champions of the Music of the Future. He dies surrounded by the atmosphere of music, bequeathing to posterity his immortal works. His epitaph should be in the words of the poet he has so beautifully illustrated:—

"'Sleep,' said the Peri, as softly she stole
The farewell sigh of that vanishing soul,
As true as e'er warmed the human breast;
'Sleep on, in visions of odour rest!
In balmier airs than ever yet stirr'd
The enchanted pile of that holy bird,
Who sings at the last his own death lay,
And in music and perfume dies away.'"

"THE SHADOW OF DEATH."

(To the Editor of the "Pall Mall Gazette.")

SIR,—I beg to be allowed to correct a mistake made in a paragraph of your to-day's paper concerning the position of the principal figure in my last picture. "Mr Holman Hunt's attention," it says, "has been called to the fact that in his picture of 'The Shadow of Death' he has represented the Saviour as sawing with his left hand;" and the writer goes on to say that I justify this—misquoting my own words to give this sense. The letter in the Athenæum of last week will prove to any person who reads it candidly that my meaning was that the Saviour had been sawing with the right and holding the plank with the left hand, and that in relinquishing his task he had stepped across the tressel to the space between it and the Virgin. It is only the liberty taken in imagining that the Saviour has moved from the standing place of his sawing for which I wished to account. I cannot, Sir, overlook the fact that in your paper the perversion of my meaning given is unfairly designed to mislead your readers, and that I have the right to disprove such a mischievous misstatement, although I have none to dispute your critic's judgment on art questions.—I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

January 28. W. HOLMAN HUNT.

DRESDEN.—We had a genuine artistic treat when Madame Otto-Alvsleben, whom the Dresdeners admire so much, gave a concert at the Hotel de Saxe, assisted by such eminent artists as Herr Reinecke, the Conductor of the Leipsic Gewandhaus Concerts, Herr De Ahna, Concertmeister of Berlin, and Herren Zizold and Meinel. All the local papers bestow the highest praise on our celebrated townswoman. The Dresdener Journal says:—"Frau Otto-Alvsleben has not lost anything of the beautifully soft and clear timbre, nor of the purity and smoothness of her sympathetic voice. Her well-known technique, full of artistically and musically correct feeling, was visible in all her performances. Her singing of Meyerbeer's aria from L'Etoile du Nord, with the accompaniment of two flutes, was distinguished throughout by clever and fluent vocalism, and perfect accuracy of intonation." The Dresdener Press writes:—"Frau Otto-Alvsleben, so much appreciated in England, especially in oratorio, gave the aria of Cleopatra, in Handel's Julius Cæsar, which she executed with such accuracy and precision as to provoke unanimous applause. Equally distinguished was her performance of all her other pieces, and the richness and power of her voice were as much admired as the highly artistic use she made of it.

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

(From the "Daily Telegraph.")

The novelty at last Monday week's concert was a pianoforte Trio by Chopin, whose works, if not unduly neglected, looking at their comparative value, are played in St James's Hall less frequently than the repute of the author would warrant. Thanks to his delightful pianoforte music, Chopin is more intimately known by the public at large than many composers who were far greater musicians, and it goes to show on what strict principles the Monday Popular Concerts are conducted when the most important chamber-piece of such a man is played for the first time in the seventeenth season. But, though the Trio comes late, and though it may not be a great work in the sense that most of its predecessors are great, it is none the less welcome. Those among the audience who took with them vivid impressions of Chopin's peculiar grace, refinement, and originality, derived from his best known compositions, were perhaps disappointed with the Trio, which must have been written at an early period of the master's career. It is undoubtedly true, as the annotated programme observed, that the work "exhibits few of those characteristic features that distinguished his (Chopin's) ripe maturity," but it is not less beyond question that even moderate keenness of sight detects the composer in every movement. Moreover, those characteristics of the Trio which are not Chopin's in the popular and accepted sense, are Chopin's all the same, it being impossible to say that they come from any extraneous source. From first to last, the work is original, and the impression of this fact is made stronger by the very degree in which the music fails to suggest the master as he is best known. The Trio exhibits certain broad peculiarities which are worthy of note, especially with regard to its form. Chopin wrote at a time when the laws of form in music were far more rigidly applied than now—it seems a virtue to break them in our time—and therefore all the greater importance attaches to the proofs here exhibited of independent thought. Mr Chappell's acute analyst could not fail to observe, and observing, lay stress upon, the fact that the opening Allegro, for example, boldly ignores the orthodox procession of keys, and continues nearly throughout in that of G minor. Very many amateurs, even of the present day, look upon this as an offence against the "proprieties," and do not hesitate to hold the culprit worthy of condign punishment. But we are not now to discuss its propriety or impropriety further than the expression of an opinion that the ear is the standard by which to judge everything in music, and not tradition, nor even an intellectual conception of what makes correctness. Judged by the ear, the form of Chopin's Allegro is justified, and from this there can be no appeal. Another feature to be remarked is the unusual prominence of the pianoforte in every movement, save, perhaps, the Adagio. Chopin was above all things a writer for his own instrument; and no conditions availed to make him do other than give it a marked supremacy. In the case of the present work this predilection operated well, inasmuch as a good deal of its charm arises from the graceful, brilliant, and thoroughly characteristic pianoforte part. But, putting technical criticism aside, let us join with Monday week's audience in applauding a work so fresh and interesting, and in expressing a hope that it may soon be heard again. The performance by Mdlle Marie Krebs, Mdme Neruda, and Signor Piatti would have satisfied the not easily pleased composer himself. Especially must Mdlle Krebs be praised for a rendering of her difficult part such as could only be compassed by the highest executive powers. With the novelty of the evening were given Haydn's pretty quartet in G major (Op. 54); Beethoven's pianoforte sonata in D major (Op. 10)—to the quick movements of which Mdlle Krebs did full justice—and Mozart's Sonata in G for violin and piano. Miss Antoinette Sterling sang no less than five songs; two by Rubinstein, the beauties of which are recondite; and three by Schubert. Mr Zerbini was, as always, an excellent accompanist.

BRUNSWICK.—After long negotiations, Mad. Lucca has engaged to sing once at the Ducal Theatre the part of Selica in L'Africaine for the sum of 8,000 marks. As she will not sing for less, the Intendant has been obliged to consent to her terms; but, not to be out of pocket, he will double or treble the prices of admission.

ROYAL ALBERT HALL CONCERTS.

The "Popular" Concert which took place on the afternoon of Saturday last was tolerably well attended. The programme, if presenting no feature of novelty, was well selected, and the audience found its accustomed enjoyment in the singing of the several artists engaged in it. Miss Antoinette Sterling was in excellent voice. Her delivery of Haydn's fine song, "L'Alleluia de Sinai," with organ, violin, and harp accompaniment, was one of the specialties of the day, and was as impulsive as a pure, devotional sensibility of manner could make it. The second contribution of this lady was Mr Barnby's new song, "When the tide comes in," which, as we predicted, is making its way into the good graces of the public; and the third, her well-known version of the quaint old ballad, "The Three Ravens." Mdlle Johanna Levier, who has permanently identified herself with these concerts, sang the pretty arietta of Annchen, in Der Freischütz, "Kommt ein schankler Bursch gegannen;" Gounod's "Quand tu chantes bercée," and "The Last Rose of Summer," in her own neat and unpretending style; and Mr Cummings again earned his oft-established right to honourable mention by his cultivated rendering of Roeckel's song, "Only for Thee," and "Tom Bowling," in each of which he produced his customary effect. Mr Whitney is fast ripening into celebrity as a singer of ballads of the domestic school, and his efforts on the present occasion—Wallace's "In Happy Moments," from Maritana, and Molloy's "Shipwright"—won general admiration for the refined tastefulness of his method. In the course of the morning, violin solos (by Hiller and Bach) were played by Herr Wilhelmj, whose suave and silvery tone, and masterly powers of execution, were forcibly revealed, and challenged universal applause. Besides the above, there were certain clever organ performances, by Mr Hoyte, who, it may be observed, was encored in an Andante by Batiste; the Albert Hall choristers, at intervals, giving specimens of their matured skill in the art of part-singing—as, for instance, in the favourite madrigal of Festa, "Down in a flow'ry vale," which, by common demand, was repeated. Mr Randegger accompanied.

The attendance on Tuesday evening last, the occasion of the Orchestral Concert, was better than usual. The prevalence of a slight fog was an inconvenience, but the programme was too good to be overlooked, and hence the amphitheatre and arena seats wore a very brilliant aspect. The principal orchestral selections consisted of the Italian Symphony by Mendelssohn, and the two overtures, Weber's Freischütz and Sullivan's In Memoriam, the last chosen, no doubt, by way of tribute to the recent irreparable loss English music has sustained by the death of Sir William Sterndale Bennett, to whose memory further reference was made by an incidental performance of the Dead March in Saul. The delivery of the symphony was all that could have been expected from the body of picked players now assembled under Mr Barnby's experienced rule, and was even superior, if it be possible, to the performance which took place in December last. Every fresh hearing of Mr Sullivan's deeply suggestive overture adds to the admiration it has engendered, whether on the score of art or feeling; and when associated, as it was upon this occasion, with a revered and honoured name, it becomes doubly touching and impressive. In the first part of the concert, Herr Wilhelmj made further advances in the good opinion of the public by his performance of a violin concerto, not hitherto heard in this country, by Herr Hégar, a Kapellmeister at Zurich, and a composer, it is alleged, of songs and choral music now enjoying considerable popularity in Germany. Of the merits of the new concerto it is too early to judge, but the accomplished analyst of the concert programmes calls attention, with his accustomed discriminative intelligence, to its leading points of interest—certain novelties of form and development being, apparently, the most remarkable. The music was heard with satisfaction. As regarded the executancy of Herr Wilhelmj, there could be but one verdict as to its consummate excellence—an excellence again demonstrated in the second part of the programme, when he played a setting, by himself, of Wagner's "Albumblatt," and (accompanied by Herr Rudolph Niemann on the pianoforte) another similar setting of a Notturno by Chopin. Herr Wilhelmj will doubtless be a conspicuous figure among the celebrities of the forthcoming season. He has come—been listened to—and, most undeniably, has conquered. Mdlle Johanna Levier was the lady vocalist, and, as usual won both ear and heart by her graceful interpretation of Mendelssohn's charming lieder, "Frühlingslied" and "Lieblingsplätzchen," and Schubert's and Brahms' equally charming "Liebesbotschaft" and "Wiegenlied"—the last, a veritable exemplification of "the linked sweetness long drawn out," being encored with acclamation, as it has been before when Mdlle Levier has sung it, and as it will be again. The second vocalist was Mr Cummings, whose "Deeper and deeper still" and "Waft her angels," created the accustomed impression. This agreeable singer was also set down for Molique's finely conceived song, "When the moon is brightly shining." The vocalists were accompanied by Mr Randegger with his wonted skill.—D. H. H.

PHILHARMONIC THEATRE.

Last night Balfe's most popular opera, The Bohemian Girl, was produced, for the first time, at the Philharmonic Theatre, Islington; and the fact is, in an artistic sense, somewhat significant. This theatre has hitherto been devoted to English versions of opera-bouffe. Offenbach's Geneviéve de Brabant the Fleur de Lys of Léon Délibes, the Fille de Madame Angot of Lecocq drew thousands of people weekly from all parts of London to the little theatre at Islington; and it became the chief temple of opera-bouffe in this country. The faith or the zeal of worshippers visibly cooled of late, and even Lecocq's Giroflé-Girofla—a charming work—with elegantly written lyric versions (by Mr Campbell Clarke) of the principal vocal numbers, failed to attract permanently. That, under such circumstances, recourse should be had to higher forms of art is a gratifying recognition of artistic truths, which for a long time were preached to deaf ears; and we are glad to record the complete success of the experiment made last night, and the enthusiastic reception given to legitimate operatic art by an audience hitherto accustomed to art by no means legitimate.

Mr Nordblom, one of our best acting tenors, made a genuine success as Thaddeus, and obtained a double encore for "When other lips," which was beautifully sung. Mr Rosenthal was an admirably Count Arnheim, and was deservedly encored after "The heart bowed down." This gentleman, although chiefly known in London as an exponent of opera-bouffe, has for a long time enjoyed a high reputation in the provinces as an operatic baritone; and his performance last night proved him to be one of the best representatives of the Count Arnheim at present on the stage. Miss Monroe was an agreeable representative of Arline, and was encored after the favourite air, "I dreamt that I dwelt in marble halls." Miss Manetti was similarly complimented after the song, "Love smiles but to deceive," which (like most Gipsy Queens) she interpolated. Mr Knight Aston, as Florestan, and Mr Marler, as Devilshoof, were acceptable; the choruses were fairly good; the band efficient, though somewhat too strong in the brass instruments; and Mr Eayres conducted skilfully.

Should the Bohemian Girl prove to be a permanent attraction, other English operas will be produced by the management. Islington was for a long time the home of the Shakespearian drama; and if the earnest care displayed by Messrs Phelps and Greenwood in the casting, mounting, and rehearsing of the legitimate drama be emulated at the Philharmonic Theatre, it may acquire new lustre as the home of English opera.

CAPER O'CORBY (Bart.)

MILAN.—Sig. Manzotti's ballet, Pietro Micca, previously performed at the Teatro dal Verme, has replaced Sig. Monplaisir's Giulio Cesare at the Scala, and proved a decided hit. Sig. Pinzuti's ballet, also, La Stella del Marinajo has been successful at the Teatro della Canobbiana. —Giroflé-Girofla has not proved particularly attractive at the Teatro dal Verme.

BRESLAU.—Some seven years ago, a grand five-act romantic opera, Gustav Wasa, der Held des Nordens, was produced and frequently repeated at Weimar. It has now been brought out with marked success at the Stadttheater here, where its composer, Herr Carl Goetz, is conductor. That gentleman was called on, the first night, at the conclusion of the second act, and, also, at the conclusion of the fifth.—Herr Johannes Brahms recently paid this town a visit, playing at the sixth Subscription Concert, and at the Seventh Evening for Chamber Music given by the Orchestral Union.

STERNDALE BENNETT'S G MINOR SYMPHONY (No. 7) AT THE CRYSTAL PALACE.

(From the "Musical Standard.")

Sir W. Sterndale Bennett ranks so high as a creative genius, to say nought of his transcendent merits as an artist, and his ability as a professor, that we almost hesitate to gild the thrice assayed and genuine gold. But noblesse—(we mean Sir Sterndale's noblesse)—nous oblige. He is a tone-poet, pure and simple; a great composer; and, as regards the evolution of his ideas, a craftsman who, in accordance with the canon of Horatius Flaccus, most artfully conceals his instrumentality. The English accept Sir Sterndale Bennett as their noblest representative; and Germany, naturally disposed to frown upon foreigners from a high stand-point, because so rich in her own resources, has adopted him as one of her own sons. This symphony, the pianoforte concerto in F minor; the overtures known as Naïades and Paradise and the Peri; and, not least, that vivid dramatic sonata, The Maid of Orleans (the property of Madame Arabella Goddard), proclaim the man and his merits without the necessity of tedious citation from the catalogue raisonné of his works. Let us speak of the symphony in G minor, written for the (old) Philharmonic Society, and first produced—(without the third movement) in June, 1864. We consider this work as a happy illustration of the composer's individual genius. Light and singularly graceful throughout, it is yet in parts eminently classical, and sufficiently severe to satisfy the strictest stickler for orthodoxy, according to the "canon laws" laid down by the great masters; whilst as regards symmetrical construction, gracefulness of ideas, charming contrast and exquisite delicacy, the symphony may fairly be ranked with the accepted orchestral chefs-d'œuvre. We doubt whether Sir Sterndale Bennett will ever be a favourite with the general public, or the "advanced modern" school. His music is far too good and too recherché. He will never condescend to write down to the low school-girl level of Liszt, and his compositions are far removed from the mistiness and noise which are essentials of Wagner. Whether in the loudest passages of a stretto, or the long drawn-out extreme harmonies of Sir Sterndale, we are never at a loss to discover both the time and rhythm which he is employing; whereas in most of the music of the modern ultra-German writers, it is regarded as a sinful weakness to be bound by the rigid chain of measure and accent, to exhibit a leaning towards tune, or a fondness for one fixed tonology. When will mankind learn to distinguish between incoherent license and well-ordered freedom? Moral philosophy is here at one with music and the fine arts.

Our readers may be reminded that the symphony now includes four movements, namely, an Allegro moderato in G minor, a Minuet (with trio) in B flat, a "Romanza" (the added movement) in D major, and a Rondo finale (presto) in G minor. We were once more struck on Saturday with the large form and breadth of the ideas and treatment. Those who imagine that Bennett never thinks very deeply, never rises to earnestness and passion, must have experienced surprise at the depth and fire displayed in the working up of the end of the first movement, where occurs that exquisitely tuneful motif in B flat, beginning with skips of the minor seventh. The charm of the minuet, in the relative major, lies in its deliciously fresh melody and ingenious little bits of imitation. It is quietly scored in the pastoral style throughout. What a fine contrast to this is the trio in E flat, written exclusively for the brass band, yet quite free from noise and blare. "G" need not have relied on a mere on dit in this part of his programme. The Minuet did originally form part of the Installation Ode composed in honour of the new Chancellor of the University of Cambridge—the Duke of Devonshire—by Mr Bennett (as Professor of Music), and performed at the Senate House, on Tuesday the 10th of June, 1862, at the Inauguration Concert. We had the good fortune to be present on the occasion, to see the Professor wave the bâton, invested with his beautiful white gown of office, and to hear the enthusiastic applause of the assembled auditory (a numerous but select one), who "re-demanded" the movement, con amore e con tutta forza. The episodical change to G minor, when the Minuet is repeated, and the masterly transition from B flat to D major (the key of the succeeding "Romanza"), which is effected by a few bars of orchestral prelude, once more brings forward the master mind in bold relief. The "Romance," itself aims at little. It is a little gem in the form of a "song without words," varied by a charming contrast, for the sake of variety, in the accompaniment of the original scheme at its third occurrence, when the restless style and the lavish modulation induce a longing for the more quiescent tones of the original treatment. The concluding Rondo is, perhaps, the most uncommon of all the movements: the subject-matter so quaint and delicate, the little points of pizzicato so coquettish and sprightly. The effect of the augmented fifth in the second theme—(the skips from F natural to C sharp)—show that this Homer is never asleep when intent on his score, but always alive to his art. The sternness of form is here admirably subordinated to a freedom of thought, and treatment the most charming. We copy the concluding paragraph of "G" with great pleasure, and fully agree with its purport. "So"—writes this eloquent annotator—"so ends a work in which perfect symmetry, delicate fancy, purity of taste great individuality, and entire absence of exaggeration and extravagance, have combined to produce one of the pleasantest symphonies to listen to in the repertory of the orchestra. Would that its author would indulge us with a companion to it!"

Had any one doubted the fact that English musicians are admired and appreciated as much by the adherents of foreign factions as by their compatriots, he would have been agreeably surprised on the occasion of the thirteenth Winter Concert in the Sydenham Palace by the flattering and hearty reception awarded to Sir W. Sterndale Bennett's symphony in G minor. The manner in which this beautiful composition was greeted is sufficient to prove that pure art, in its finest and most æsthetic forms, will always make its own way by the simple force of merit, and in this regard it is opposed to the reformatory school of modern days, whose efforts need the most persistent propagandism, and even then fail to create any lasting impression. The symphony in G minor is unique in more than one respect. It is not only an English symphony, but the English symphony. Numbers of similar works ere now penned by English hands may have sufficed for one hearing, and have then been bundled into the lumber closet; even a greater quantity may be in existence which have never been heard at all; while some few are deemed worthy of occasional revival. Sir W. S. Bennett's only symphony given to the public is a masterpiece of art, the handiwork of one of the most inventive musicians that any land yet boasts of, and the production of the ripe maturity of that scholarly composer who has become endeared to the world under the pseudonym of the "English Mendelssohn."

We do not so often possess the opportunity of speaking about the G minor symphony that we can afford to pass it lightly by; and classical works always should command attention, no matter to what nationality they belong. When, therefore, the finest orchestral composition that England at present possesses is presented under such auspicious circumstances as those attendant upon its performance by Mr Manns' band, it may be rightly assumed to be a suitable time for due expatiation upon its merits. Of the antecedents of the work we need not speak at length, the barest chronicle of its production by the Philharmonic Society in 1864 as a "new orchestral piece" in three movements, its eventual development into the strict four movement symphonic form and appearance under the title of Symphony, at the Philharmonic Concerts in 1867, and its first appearance at the Crystal Palace in 1870, sufficing to refresh the memory of our readers. When first played at the Crystal Palace, however, Sir W. S. Bennett's symphony was in MS., but it was soon after engraved and issued both in score and in parts. What strikes the attention most particularly in the structure of the work is its compactness and unity, all the more remarkable from the fact of one movement being an interpolation. Whether it was the author's intention to have his G minor, like Mendelssohn's Scotch Symphony, played without any obvious pause throughout, we cannot undertake to say; but certainly it bears the evidence of great pains having been taken in the moulding of each component part to fit the others. If the design—as we imagine it to be—was that the symphony should form a continuous whole, it is a great pity that this arrangement is not preserved in performance; but if, on the other hand, the movements were meant to be separate, it seems to us that the two subsidiary portions (the Introduzione al Minuetto and Intermezzo) are somewhat superfluous. Without any introductory matter the symphony dashes at once into the allegro moderato—a movement full of bewitching grace, just tinged with sadness, most beautifully scored for the orchestra, and abounding in those independent figures for the various instruments which form so great a part of the charm of Schubert's instrumental compositions. This portion of the symphony is remarkably brief, the double bar being soon reached, and the working out being quite a subordinate matter. What has been done, however, has been wrought by a master who evidently knew the best purpose to which to put the materials at his disposal. The meditative recitative passages for the first violins are, perhaps, the most striking feature of the allegro, which is characterized throughout by great beauty of treatment and freshness and elegance of expression. The allegro over gives place to eight bars of modulation for the strings, which lead up to the minuetto in the relative major (B flat). This minuet is more like a reverie than one of those piquant and naive movements to be found in Haydn's or Mozart's compositions, and really possesses much of the character of a love song, with its quiet dreamy melody and rich harmonies. "G." tells us that this minuet originally formed part of an Installation Ode, composed in 1862 by Mr Bennett in pursuance of his duties as professor of music in the University of Cambridge, "where it points an allusion to the amusements of Alma Mater." We fail to perceive the force of the latter remark—does it mean that dancing minuets are one of the "amusements?" Coming after the smooth, flowing strains of the minuet, the trio breaks upon us rather suddenly with its marked accent and brazen tone. Trombones, horns, and trumpets are alone engaged in the trio, which is in every respect opposed to the character of the minuet. In the recapitulation of the latter a new modulation into the initial key of the symphony (G minor) takes place; the original key (B flat) is, however, resumed, and the minuet ends as it began, peacefully and tenderly. The next section is the interpolated movement, a "Romanza" in D major, ushered in by a few transitory bars for the full orchestra. This is indeed, a pure song without words, having an exquisite and touching melody, given out by the violas, and accompanied by charming instrumental figures. The scoring here is beautiful, and the striking and effective modulations—almost as characteristic of Sir W. S. Bennett as they are of Spohr—are happily and judiciously used. The romanza is repeated almost in its integrity, and then comes an episode of a more dramatic and restless nature, in which the character of the air and its accompaniment are changed; after a time, however, the disturbance ceases, the violas take up once more the original dainty theme, and the movement closes quietly. An intermezzo tempo di minuetto leads from the romance to the finale, which is a fairy-like presto in rondo form. In marked contrast to each of the preceding movements is this; all the mystery of the allegro and the tender pleading accents of the minuet and romanza vanish and give place to a theme as delicate and airy as the most joyous of elfin strains, interspersed with subtle touches of humour. The alternation between the bowed notes and those played pizzicato is charming as well as amusing, and the spirit and vivacity with which the subject is kept up render the finale thoroughly enjoyable, and a worthy wind-up to a work fraught with interest, and teeming with ideas throughout. Sir W. S. Bennett shows us, at any rate, that it is possible to unite melody with the highest forms of musical expression, and his symphony in G minor is a direct refutation of the modern dictum, that the fountain of tune has run dry, and that it is only to "new-found methods and to compounds strange" that the musician of the present has to look for the due production of effect. The performance was up to the average of Crystal Palace playing, and the audience were thoroughly delighted with both the work and the manner in which it was rendered. We cannot quit the notice of the symphony without quoting the remarks "G." has appended to his analysis in the book of words—"And so ends a work in which perfect symmetry, delicate fancy, purity of taste, great individuality, and entire absence of exaggeration and extravagance, have combined to produce one of the pleasantest symphonies to listen to in the repertory of the orchestra. Would that its author would indulge us with a companion to it."

(From the "Observer.")

Yesterday the thirteenth Saturday concert of the season was given at the Crystal Palace, and presented many attractions. The chief instrumental work was the G minor symphony of Sir Sterndale Bennett—a charming work, which, strange to say, has not been heard here for five years past. In its original form, as first played at the concert of the Philharmonic Society, on the 27th June, 1864, it consisted of three movements only, but it was subsequently enriched by the addition of the pathetic and graceful "Romanza" which now forms one of the chief ornaments of the work; and in this shape it was reproduced in July, 1867, at the Philharmonic Society's concerts. From beginning to end it shows the hand of a master. It has no pretensions to grandeur, and is not remarkable for strongly developed sentiment, even in the larghetto cantabile "Romanza;" but it is so filled with grace and beauty that it enchains the ear of the listener; and not once does a passage occur which fails to repay attention. The first movement, "Allegro moderato," opens with a suggestive phrase for the violins, which recurs several times in the subsequent working out of this and the subsidiary "subjects," and is introduced with happy results in connection with the presentation of the latter by the wind instruments. The minuet which follows is less effective than the trio pomposo to which it leads, and both are surpassed by the beautiful "Romanza." This effective movement is full of the grace and sympathetic charm which belongs to its author's compositions, and is none the less welcome because in some portions it is suggestive of Mendelssohn, while free from any suspicion of plagiarism. The final movement, a "Rondo Presto," is the most original and striking portion of the symphony, full of height, melody, and playful fancy, and worthy of Mendelssohn himself. Throughout the work the abundance of melody was not more remarkable than the happy use of the orchestra. The flute, oboe, and clarionet have important parts to play, and these were more than safe in the hands of such artists as MM. Wells, Dubrucq, and Clinton. The strings and brass were also employed in a masterly way, and attention was kept on the alert, not only by the beauty of leading themes, but also by the variety of the orchestral devices which were unexpectedly manifested. The symphony was received with warm and prolonged applause, and will bear early repetition.

MUSIC AT BERLIN.

The third character chosen by Herr Ernst, at the Royal Opera-house, was that of Manrico in Il Trovatore. Though his performance was nothing extraordinary, it was good enough, apparently, to satisfy Herr von Hülsen, the Intendant-General, for Herr Ernst has been permanently secured, his engagement commencing from the 1st April next. Madlle Brandt was effective as Azucena. Herr Wüerst's comic opera, A-ing-fo-hi, was successfully produced on the 25th ult. On the 22nd ult., there was a grand Subscription Ball, on a very magnificent scale, the Emperor and Empress, with their whole Court, being present.

La Jolie Parfumeuse, or Schönröschen, as they have re-named it here, continues its course at the Wallner-Theater, but without creating the furore which attended other works by the same composer. The principal parts are sustained with great spirit by Mesdes Mila Röder, Wegner, Löffiler, Herren Helmerding, Engel, and Wilken.

The programme of the first Quartet Soirée given by Herren Rehfeld, Sandow, Gustav Richter, and Jacobowski, consisted exclusively of works by Haydn, Mozart, and Beethoven. The success of this first Soirée augurs well for the result of the new venture.

Herr Joseph Wieniawski's concert at the Singacademie attracted a fair and tolerably enthusiastic audience.

Dr W. Langhans has presented a petition from the Universal Musical Association of Germany, praying the Prussian House of Representatives to call upon the Prussian Government to introduce generally the collegiate system, after the model of the Royal High Schools for Science, and the Royal High School for Music.

For some time, the Post warmly espoused the cause of Herr R. Wagner, and of his music. Recently, a change has come oer the spirit of its dream. Speaking of the performance, not long ago, of Euryanthe at the Royal Operahouse, the above paper remarks: "This Euryanthe is a casket of precious pearls, and centuries hence—as long as a song is heard—Posterity will rejoice in it with pride and rapture, when Der Fliegende Holländer, Rienzi, and Tannhäuser shall have long slumbered covered with dust on library-shelves, and only form part of the history of music."

The Echo publishes the following remarks for the benefit of the Corporation:—

"The City Fathers are forgetting among the very many celebrated children of the capital the most celebrated. We cannot otherwise explain why, in the long list of men whose effigies are to adorn the Rathhaus, music is represented solely by Felix Mendelssohn (born, by the way, at Hamburgh). We would not on any account miss this master from the hall of fame, or have him, for instance, changed for Zelter or Rungenhagen, but we must seriously direct attention to the fact that there was born in Berlin a master of tone who also gained a world-wide reputation, and who, moreover, held a high post in Berlin, where he was, moreover, buried. This master—Meyerbeer—has, most inexplicably, been forgotten! It might very easily come to pass that, for such want of reverence, the French would justly make merry at our expense. Let this incomprehensible fault be at once rectified, and, should there not otherwise be space enough, let one of those in the list be omitted whose name recalls no song, no heroic book or no work of art."

William Sterndale Bennett,

BORN APRIL 16, 1816. DIED FEBRUARY 1, 1875.

WILLIAM STERNDALE BENNETT.

Snapt is the chord that vibrated full oft—
Full oft? Alas, that we might say full long!—
With music rare as ever breathed in song,
Weaving bright thought with passion wild or soft!
Our Sterndale's spirit hath its earth-crust doff'd,
Mounting on high with pinions wide and strong,
Well fit to join the everlasting throng
Who sing and harp before the throne aloft.
The master's hand is useless now and still—
Still the friend's hand, and cold, once true and warm—
Yet lives in many a scroll the master's skill,
And glows in many a breast the friend's fond charm.
Upon the rest, Death work thy wasting will!
These and their spirit-fount thou canst not harm.

Feb. 1, 1875. CHARLES LAMB KENNEY.

ON Monday last, about mid-day, William Sterndale Bennett "joined the majority," at the by no means advanced age of fifty-nine. Only a week before, with reference to the hearing of his symphony in G minor at the Crystal Palace, several of our contemporaries expressed an ardent hope that he would give more such things to the admiring world. There is an end to all such hopes and counsels now. The life-labour of Sterndale Bennett has closed. To him the night has come, "wherein no man can work." The brain is still; the hand it guided has lost its power; and all that remains to do is to "bury the dead out of our sight." For this, we who are left behind, grieve. We lament that the possibilities of the future, with regard to Sterndale Bennett, are shut off from us by that black curtain, which is ever near, and behind which we shall all vanish in our turn. It cannot be said of the departed composer that he was gathered to the great garner "like a shock of corn, fully ripe." At his age many a master has shown the vigour of a healthy mind in a healthy body, and, for years after, done brave things in the cause of art and on behalf of his own reputation. This privilege has, in the inscrutable dispensations of Providence, been denied to Sterndale Bennett, and the possible advantage of it has been withheld from us. Naturally, as we reflect upon these things, we are tempted to rebellious thoughts against the decrees of Fate. We compare that which is with that which might have been, and, judging the situation by our own poor notions of what is best, we utter hard words in the midst of our grief. But if this is the case among the men who knew Sterndale Bennett only as the accomplished musician, how must it be in that narrower circle where he was loved as a friend? Within the limits of that circle we do not presume to intrude. The grief now reigning there is sacred, and only concerns outsiders as it appeals to the sympathy of tender hearts. Over all, then, in a greater or less degree, the removal of our composer has thrown a gloom. Reason as we may we cannot make death cheerful. It involves too much absolute loss to the survivors for any such result as that. The end of aspirations, of well-doing, of loving intercourse, of bright example,—and death means this and more—must ever come as a great and terrible blow.

But while the foregoing be true, it is true, also, that tradition and a gloomy creed have taught us to look upon the end of earthly life as a much more fearful thing than it really is. Distorted religious views have surrounded the event with every concomitant of terror, and so far succeeded in hiding its character that few recognize in death a process as natural as birth. Admitting that a good deal of the sorrow attendant upon bereavement has its origin in selfishness, much springs from genuine sympathy with the departed one. We speak of him as "poor," and shake our heads mournfully as we recall his memory. How much of this commiseration is absolute waste? Dead men have simply completed a stage in the infinite circle of life! If you weep and wail over a fallen leaf, the philosopher will tell you that its atoms are destined to live again in an infinite series of glorious forms. If it be thus with the meanest organism of nature, how shall it be with that marvellous entity, the spirit of man? Sterndale Bennett dead! He is more alive than ever he was. This afternoon they will sing above a grave in Westminster Abbey, "His body is buried in peace, but his name liveth evermore"—not his name merely, let us add, but the man himself, in some higher and grander phase of existence, where, with enlarged capacities, greater possibilities open before him. To this we do not expect assent from all. Never mind. Let those whose notions of human life are bounded by birth and death get what comfort a cheerless creed will yield. They are welcome to it.

But there are other reasons for reverent submission to the decree which has taken away our master. He lives with us in his works. The music he created conquered, in some sense, the power of death. It could not arrest natural decay. The "earthly house of the tabernacle" dissolved, as earthly houses will, but the master remains in his art-work. Have the geniality, the delicate fancy, the exquisite refinement, the true poetic feeling of the musician, Sterndale Bennett, passed from us? Emphatically, no! nor can they pass. We recognize this species of immortality, often without knowing it, when we say, "Beethoven does this," or "Mozart does that." Such men are always in the present tense, because they ever live. Let us then in view of the change which, last Monday, came upon Sterndale Bennett, take heart of hope; even turning the event to account by changing sympathy from the man himself, who does not need it, into zeal for his reputation, which we may yet more fully help to vindicate now that his personality is no longer here as a mark for the jealousies and detractions that merit never fails to excite.

STERNDALE BENNETT is to be buried at noon, to-day, in Westminster Abbey. The honour is no more than what was due to one of England's most rarely gifted sons. None will envy it him, because every one who had the good fortune to know him also knew his worth. He was not merely an artist of the highest distinction, but a genuine, unaffected, noble-minded man. All who were acquainted with him loved him for his character, no less than they admired him for his genius. Very few artists have departed this life with so many, in grave sincerity, to deplore their loss. At Westminster Abbey, to-day, the anthem will consist of Bennett's own beautiful part-song, "God is a spirit" (The Woman of Samaria), and Handel's "His body is buried in peace." Nothing could be more appropriate to the occasion.

—o—

The requisition to the Dean of Westminster to permit the interment of Sir Sterndale Bennett in Westminster Abbey was signed by the following names:—Lord Coleridge, Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol, G. A Macfarren, Sir Julius Benedict, Walter Macfarren, G. F. Anderson, Lucy Anderson, A. Randegger, Otto Goldschmidt, Jenny Lind Goldschmidt, G. A. Osborne, W. G. Cusins, J. T. Willy, W. F. Low, J. STERNDALE BENNETT.

He is not dead—oh, such as he die not!
Speak not of him who held those mighty powers
As of the crowd, who go through life's brief hours,
Then die, and are forgot.

No, the grand sons of music do not die!
Oh, not for them Death's all-dividing gloom,
And not for them the silence of the tomb—
We hear their voices nigh:

When, in his noble works, the master's skill
Makes passion rage through his resounding chords,
Or grieve, in tender plaints, like sob'rest words,
Which thousand list'ners thrill;

When softly steals, on the ear-open soul,
Those great creations of a heaven-dower'd mind,
Whose lovely thoughts their seedling time will find
Through years which here-ward roll.

Is not such charm immortal? we know well
Our babes will feel it with as fine a glow.
Music is part of heavenly bliss, and so
O'er death must hold a spell.

Thus Bennett lives; and thus his name shall be
A living gift to grace the unborn years,
In every land where humankind hath ears
For all-tongued melody.

'Tis well for England's honour that renown
Circled his modest brows, ere they were dust.
Now he may rest—since rest, alas! he must—
Wearing a well-earn'd crown.

But raise his frame revered, which was the shrine
Of kindly heart, as well as gifted brain,
(Oh, rarely sweet, in this world poor and vain,
Such simple souls do shine!)

Lay him with our most honoured dead to sleep,
While his own notes, like mourning children, rave
Around his tomb: Earth but the dross can have;
The precious gold we keep.

HERR JOSEPH JOACHIM has arrived in London, and is to play at the Crystal Palace this afternoon. All hail!—Jupiter-tonnans!

Prayer.

(From "Another World.")

"Forget not the source from whence all blessings come."

The children are encouraged not only in their affection to their parents, and immediate associates, but in brotherly love to all, and the whole discourse, which is very short, is pointed to their duty to God, being calculated to instil feelings of love and adoration for His goodness.

In the first series, for very young children whose intelligence is undeveloped, we have forms and ceremonies, the tendency of which is to fix their attention and inculcate thoughts and habits of a good tendency.

In the second series the addresses are of a more elevated character, and are accompanied by fewer forms and ceremonies.

In the highest series there are scarcely any ceremonies, and although the service and discourses are short, every one is expected to pass a certain time each day in voluntary prayer and meditation, in the private cabinet which in every house is set apart for devotion only.

Though the prayers for children are short, the preacher is greatly assisted by our method of education, inculcating the worship of the Supreme, by habits which the child is led to form. Thus we require the greatest attention to cleanliness, to the mode of eating, sleeping, talking, and indeed to all the daily practices of life.

The inculcation and exercise of good habits is considered to form, as it were, a perpetual living hymn to the Creator.

Lectures.

Besides all this, twice a week, amusing lectures are delivered, on familiar subjects, to explain and illustrate the power and goodness of God.

A flower, for instance, is taken, and, in simple terms, intelligible to nearly every capacity, attention is called to its thousand fibres, its construction, growth, perfume, colour, delicacy of texture, loveliness, and to the wonders associated with its birth, death, and resurrection to life.

Another day, perhaps, the subject may be a child, a fly, or some other familiar object; but, whatever be the subject, the discourse is of a good tendency, and youth are early imbued with love and admiration for the Supreme Being.

Our objection to children repeating or listening to words which they do not understand is not confined to those of sacred import. During the education of their young minds the subject taught and the expressions used are adapted to their intelligence. Even though they may repeat every word of the lesson set with minute accuracy, they are not allowed to quit it, or to attend a lecture on another subject, until they have passed through examination in different forms, and often by different masters, and the result has clearly shown that they thoroughly understand what the words of the lesson are intended to convey.

So important is this considered that, on the occasion of the public solemn ceremony, when, in presence of the Kings, the preceptor is appointed to his responsible duties, one of the obligations to which he is required to subscribe is, that he will teach the pupil to understand thoroughly, and not merely by rote,—"monkey-like," or as you would probably say "parrot-like," were the same obligation imposed in your world.

Hermes (Communicator.)

Cassel.—The Baron von Gilsa, formerly a captain in the second artillery regiment of the Prussian Guards, has been appointed Intendant of the Theatre Royal, in place of Herr von Carlshausen, lately deceased. He will enter on the discharge of his new duties on the 1st of April next.

OCCASIONAL NOTES.

Sir Sterndale Bennett.—Six hundred admissions have been issued for the choir at Westminster Abbey, where the funeral of Sir Sterndale Bennett is to take place to-day at noon. The Philharmonic Society, the Royal Society of Musicians, the Cambridge University, and the Choirs of St Paul's and Westminster, will all be represented. The Choir only will be reserved, the rest of the Abbey being open, as usual, to the public generally.

The American papers publish very favourable accounts of Mdlle Albani's performance of the part of Elsa in Lohengrin, which has been played several times, with Mdlle Albani in the principal character, at New York and also at Boston. At one of the representations there was a "double attraction," consisting of Lohengrin on the stage and the King of the Sandwich Islands in the boxes. Herr Wagner, who thought nothing of the Parisians not caring for Tannhäuser will be pleased to hear that King Kalakua was delighted with Lohengrin. The New York Herald compliments his Majesty warmly on having shown "his appreciation of the music of the future," and records the significant fact that he "remained until the end of the opera." The presence of Royalty is said to have had a very inspiriting effect on the prima donna of the evening, though King Kalakua must, we fancy, have been quite as much and as favourably impressed by Mdlle Albani as Mdlle Albani can have been by King Kalakua. From the first appearance of Elsa before the King "everything is said to have gone admirably"—the "King" in this instance being apparently the monarch not of the Sandwich Islands, but of Wagner's opera. Shaber Silber.

On Monday, the 4th January, Mad. Schmidt-Zimmermann sang, at the Stadttheater, Hamburgh, the part of Anna in Marschner's Hans Heiling, and, on Tuesday, the 5th, that of Elsa in Herr R. Wagner's Lohengrin. Immediately after the last piece, she set out for Holland, to sing, on the 6th, 7th, and 8th, at the grand concerts given respectively by the well-known societies, Diligentia at the Hague, Eruditio Musica in Rotterdam, and Felix Meritis in Amsterdam. On Sunday, the 10th, she was back again at the Stadttheater, where she sang in Herr R. Wagner's Fliegender Holländer. The fair artist appears to have as great a capacity for work, and as marvellous powers of endurance, as the late Lord St Leonards himself.

By the death of Mr John Henry Griesbach, musical science has lost an earnest student, for there was probably no member of the musical profession who had devoted more time and attention to the mathematical side of the subject. The results of his investigations were given in a volume entitled "Analysis of Musical Sounds, with Illustrative Figures of the Ratios of Vibrations of Musical Intervals," &c., in which, with the aid of an elaborate series of diagrams, he made visible the character and extent of the vibrations of the various intervals. In the discussions which have taken place from time to time in the musical papers he defended his theories with great ability, and he also took an active part in the work of the committees appointed to arrive at some decision as to the adoption of a uniform pitch for concert purposes in this country. In the discussions as to the merits of what are known as the Equal and Unequal Temperament, he was a strong advocate of the former. Mr Griesbach was also well known as a pianist and as a teacher.—Pall Mall Gazette.

It appears that in America a right much prized in some theatre-loving countries—the right to hiss—is not tolerated. The right, on the other hand, to encore a song four times is recognized. Both points were recently tested at the Globe Theatre of Boston, where a gentleman who had waited patiently while some favourite song was repeated again and again, found his patience giving way after the third encore, and at the fourth ventured upon a slight sibilation. This was more than the officials could stand. One of them tapped the gentleman on the shoulder, and threatened, unless he remained quiet and listened to the fourth encore, to have him removed by the police. Thus admonished, the amateur kept his peace, and heard once more the performance of which he was heartily tired. Next morning he sought consolation in writing to the newspapers; and his part is taken by the New York Times, which bears witness to the fact that hissing is rarely heard at American theatres, adding that "practised within due bounds and at proper moments, it would rid the stage of many shams, and temper the excess of the applause." In Vienna, by a new regulation, operatic artists who repeat a song are fined as for a misdemeanour. In New York it is on those who object to the repetition that punishment falls. Shabert Silber.

THE Municipalities of Italy appear to have been seized lately with a fit of economy, and to have determined on gratifying it at the expense of music. The Municipality of Naples has suppressed the grant to the San Carlo, and that of Rome appears inclined to follow this example, next season, at the Apollo. The Municipality of Florence has abolished the bands of the National Guard; Rome imitates Florence and dissolves the band of the Municipal Guards, and thinks of pursuing the same plan with that of the Vigili.

HERR VON WALDECK, a painter, recently celebrated in Paris his one-hundred-and-ninth birthday. The old gentleman belongs to a noble family of the whilom Holy Roman Empire. In his youth he was compelled, for some unknown cause or other, to leave his native country. He was for a time teacher of the harp to Queen Marie Antoinette. During the Reign of Terror, he travelled about to various places. He subsequently enlisted in the French army, and was present at the battle of Austerlitz. He has been three times married; his third wife presenting him, in his 85th year, with a son. He is still quite hearty, and walks without a stick. He is said to speak no less than twenty-one languages. There, Mr Thoms! and there, Professor Max Müller!

CONCERTS VARIOUS.

MISS JULIE SYDNEY'S evening concert took place on Wednesday, February 3, at the Beethoven Rooms. The talented lady earned much applause from the numerous audience for her singing of Meyerbeer's "Roberto tu che adoro," Molloy's "Thaddy O'Flynn," Bevignani's "Fioraja," and Herr W. Coenen's "Lovely spring." The concert-giver also joined Miss Estelle Emrick, and Messrs Percy Rivers and T. Morse, in Verdi's Quartet, "Un di si ben." Some other vocal pieces were greatly admired, among them being Schira's "Sognai," charmingly sung by Miss Grace Lindo. Herr Schuberth, the violoncellist, was heard to advantage in a cavatina by Raff; and Herr Oberthür, besides cleverly accompanying Miss Sydney in "Roberto tu che adoro," played in brilliant style his fantasia for the harp on Scotch melodies. Miss Alma York, a pupil of Miss Sydney's, showed, in Meyerbeer's "Nobil Signor," that her talent was under good care; and a pianoforte solo, by Mr W. S. Hoyte, was included in the programme. S. M.

M. ALEXANDRE BILLET'S RECITALS.—The recitals of pianoforte music annually given by M. Billet always command attention, not only from the artistic skill brought to bear upon them, but from the taste and judgment shown in the selection of works for performance. A thorough master of all styles worth preserving, M. Billet is always happy in the choice of pieces, even when exemplifying the newest phases of musical ideality; and those who take delight in the old school, as well as those whose proclivities are for the romantic and modern styles, find in the esteemed Russian pianist a very reliable as well as interesting interpreter. First in the musical field this season, as becomes a leader of acknowledged repute, M. Billet inaugurated his new series of performances in St George's Hall with a selection of music which, from the most exacting stand-point, defied criticism, and yet was not extravagantly severe nor abstruse. The classical authors expounded were Bach, Handel, Dussek, and Beethoven, whilst the modern pianoforte school was represented by Mendelssohn, Chopin, and Moscheles.—The Hour.

A CONCERT was given last Friday week, at St James's Hall, for the benefit of Mr Henry King, a gentleman who has been for a great many years connected with "music and musicians," and who, unfortunately, has been for some time unable to follow any occupation. The vocalists were the Misses Johanna Levier, Sophie Ferrari, and Helen d'Alton, Messrs W. H. Cummings, and Maybrick. Miss Levier particularly pleased us in Brahms' "Wiegen-Lied"; Miss Sophie Ferrari in Benedict's "I am thine, only thine"; and Miss Helen d'Alton in Lover's "What will you do, love?" Mr Henry Leslie's choir, conducted by the director himself, distinguished itself by some excellent performances, especially in Sir Julius Benedict's "Hunting Chorus," conducted by the composer, which excited great enthusiasm, and had to be repeated at the unanimous desire of the audience. Sir Julius Benedict also gave his own "Where the bee sucks" (for the first time these seven years) on the pianoforte, and the brilliancy of his playing, the charm of his touch, were enough to make every one regret that he is so seldom heard in public as a solo player. Mr Walter Bache played two pianoforte pieces by Schubert in his best style. The miserable weather on Friday did not prevent a large audience assembling, and we therefore hope that the concert was as successful financially as it was musically. A vote of thanks is due to the committee, in which were included some of the principal music publishers, and to Mr Stanley Lucas as hon. secretary and treasurer, for their exertions.—SIGMUND MENKES.

THE FUNERAL OF JEAN-FRANCOIS MILLET.

The great and original French painter Millet, who died last week at Barbizon, near Fontainbleau, was not as well known in England as he deserved. We publish the following passages from a letter written immediately after his funeral by an accomplished French lady to an English correspondent:—

"We have just returned from Millet's funeral, and our thoughts fly to you and to the day when for the first time we crossed all together the humble threshold of the greatest artist France possessed. Fate seems to have decreed that one by one her great men shall be taken from her, and that nothing shall remain to her in this hour of mediocrity and doubt but the rich memories of the past. Our great painter has passed away in his poverty, unnoticed in the desolation of our indifference. The poor straggling funeral procession carried the body through the silent forest of Barbizon, and so across the great plains of Chailly to the little village church. There was a terrible storm, and the wind swept the rain in heavy masses over the country. As the little procession fell into rank on the road two peasants, ploughing in a field, stayed their work, drove the ploughshare into the ground, and waited to see the coffin pass. They, too, were indifferent as the rest. They knew not that in that simple bier lay the remains of the great poet of their toils and of their sorrows, who had written the poems of their lives in colours that will not fade. These peasants, their plough, the land furrowed in long deep lines by the share, the melancholy of the great open country, bordered on the horizon by the woods and rocks of Apremont—all made one feel that here had been the source of Millet's inspiration. It was in the effort to tell us something of the true meaning of these things, simple but grand and eternal, of nature, and of man the toiler, that he spent his great heart. But eye and soul were quickly torn away from this scene of beauty, and from all kindly memories, by a picture more fitting the pencil of a Courbet than a Millet. Some dirty choristers, their stiff surplices hastily thrust over their rough working clothes, their heads enveloped with rusty scarves, half hidden by immense umbrellas, snuffled out the funeral service in a shocking drawl. The priests, still more odious in their indifference, made no attempt to conceal their eagerness to get through the storm-beaten and unproductive ceremony (for Millet had desired a burial of the third class only). The church, an unpretending edifice enough, had been lately restored, and glared with brightly painted angels, from whose bare arms and shoulders hung garlands of paper flowers. It is impossible to describe the desolate and chilling effect of the scene. No one spoke a word of commemoration over the dead; the coffin, ornamented by a single wreath of camellias, was hastily lowered into the grave and the little group soon dispersed. For ourselves we lingered awhile, and an artist who had known Millet and loved him came up to me, the tears in his eyes, and gave me a little bunch of immortelles tied with a black ribbon. He had taken it off the coffin. It was the only relic of this sad ceremony. I send you a few of the flowers, for I know that you Positivists commemorate the great dead; and we have lost a great man. Perhaps France, now that he is taken from her, she too, will say, 'Now is virtue gone from me.' Poor Millet leaves a widow and nine children, no fortune, a studio full of unfinished works, portfolios of sketches, which will make the fortunes of twenty picture dealers, and yet perhaps will not ensure bread or shelter ai suoi cari."

ROYAL ALBERT HALL CONCERTS.—The second Popular Concert will be given this (Saturday) evening, the 6th inst., with Mdlle Johanna Levier, Miss Antoinette Sterling, Mr Sims Reeves, and Mr Whitney, as vocalists. Mr Reeves is announced to sing the "Bay of Biscay," and a new song by Arthur Sullivan, "The love that loves me not." Herr Wilhelmj, whose performances have been received with so much enthusiasm, is to play the Theme with variations from the Kreutzer Sonata. The Part-Song Choir of the Royal Albert Hall Choral Society, under the direction of Mr Barnby, will sing several part-songs, and some organ solos will be contributed by Dr Stainer. On Ash Wednesday, a performance of the Messiah is announced, with Madame Lemnens-Sherrington, Miss Spiller, Madame Patey, Mr Vernon Rigby, and Mr Whitney, as principals. Mdme Patey will, on this occasion, make her first appearance in London, since her recent marked successes in Paris. Dr Stainer will preside at the organ, and the oratorio will, as usual, be conducted by Mr Barnby.

PROVINCIAL.

LEEDS.—Mdme and Signor Campobello's concert tour appears, from all accounts, to have been a "series of triumphs." The whole party afford a musical treat rarely to be obtained in the provinces. At Leeds, last week, they gave a recital of Faust, when, under the conductorship of Mr Hallé, whose band is now one of the finest in the kingdom, they had one of their largest audiences, and made one of the greatest "hits" of the season. Mdme Campobello, as Marguerite, and Signor Campobello, as Mephistopheles, were both very successful, and thoroughly pleased the audience, while Mdme Stella Bonheur, as Siebel, made a great impression, and shewed that she possesses a powerful, yet sweet, contralto. Signor Caravoglia, engaged for the occasion to undertake the part of Valentine, added not a little to the interest of the evening. He was enthusiastically greeted and applauded throughout, a most marked effect being made by him in the well-known "La croce." With such a party, which, we must not omit to mention, included the brilliant pianist, Signor Tito Mattei, and the excellent conductor, Signor Campana, we can well understand the success they have everywhere met with.

NOTTINGHAM.—The Nottingham Journal of January 27th says:—

"Last night the Sacred Harmonic Society gave the fourth concert of the season, Acis and Galatea being the work chosen. Of the performance we must speak in the highest terms, and if we use a redundancy of superlatives, it is because occasion requires it. Madame Sinico sang her songs excellently. She possesses a good clear voice (not of the highest range), the lower tones of which are very good. Mr Lloyd was in very good voice, and the bell-like tones of his upper notes were highly appreciated. Mr Guy interprets the music of Damon very faithfully, and he exerts himself to the utmost without taking liberties with the text. The honours of the evening were reserved for Signor Campobello, a genuine British basso. His voice is like the diapason of an organ, possessing sweetness rarely equalled. The choruses, of which there are very few, were sung with excellent effect, and gave evidence of careful training. The pianissimo passages were sung in such fashion as to leave no room to doubt the thrilling effect of soft music on the popular ear. Mr Essex presided at the organ, and rendered excellent service by his tasteful selection of stops, as also by his manipulation of the pedals. Mr Farmer conducted with his wonted ability, and to that ability, no doubt, we owe the best concert of the season. A short miscellaneous part brought the concert to a close."

BATH.—The Pump Room was crowded in every part—writes our correspondent, ARGUS—on the occasion of the special concert, with Mdme Liebhart as vocalist. The band was unusually strong, there being twenty performers. As I expected, the large number of persons present, to whom Mdme Liebhart was only known by reputation, were delighted with each performance of this accomplished lady. Her first song was "Sweet Spirit hear my prayer;" then followed "Little bird so sweetly singing," which was rendered in a very "bird-like" way, and, with the flute obbligato of Mr Bartlett, obtained from the audience such applause as to cause the fair cantatrice to be under the necessity of "Coming through the rye," to meet the satisfaction of her admirers, who would not be silenced till Mdme Liebhart pointedly asked, "Why are you wandering here I pray," in a manner most bewitching. Her last song was "I love my love" (Pinsuti). The slight foreign accent perceptible in the rendering of these English songs added to their charming effect. The instrumental portion of the programme was selected with discrimination. It comprised two overtures which I never tire of hearing, those to Maritana and William Tell. They were well played, and the audience applauded the efforts of the musicians. The concert altogether was a decided success.

GLASGOW.—We read in the Glasgow Herald of January 30 as follows:—

"On Wednesday evening, the Glasgow Amateur Orchestral Society gave, in the Queen's Rooms, their eighth concert. The performance was the best which has yet been given by the society, and it is gratifying to observe that its members continue to make steady progress. The concert opened with Beethoven's overture to his ballet music, Prometheus. It was remarkably well played, and at once showed that the orchestra had been thoroughly drilled. Reinecke's Entr'acte to King Manfred followed, a paltry piece which has been too often performed of late in Glasgow. Wallace's Overture to Maritana was, we considered, the best performed piece of the evening; and it has been often heard rendered by a professional orchestra too much less advantage. Many of the strict passages were given in exquisite taste and with perfect feeling. With the exception of the Andante, the execution of Haydn's Symphony deserves warm commendation. Considering the admirable manner in which the other movements were played, it is difficult to understand how the lovely Andante was so indifferently gone through, and we would advise the conductor and the members of the orchestra to reconsider their interpretation of this section of a very fine work. The next orchestral piece was a Serenade by Neswadba. It is a washy bit of music, but received full justice in its execution from the orchestra. A spirited performance of Flotow's Overture to Stradella brought the concert to a close. A special word of praise is due to the young lady who played in capital style two movements from Mendelssohn's G minor Pianoforte Concerto. She possesses a good, firm touch, combined with a correct idea of the music, and highly pleased the audience. We understand that this young pianist is a pupil of Mr Howden, of this city. It gives us pleasure to congratulate Signor Zavertal on his conducting. It was firm, steady, and thoroughly intelligent. One felt that he knew the import of the music, and was able to convey to the members of the orchestra the reading of it he had conscientiously conceived."

DERBY.—Mr Francis Fairlie's Company from the Globe Theatre, London, have been playing at the Lecture Hall, to crowded houses, the ever-popular Fille de Mdme Angot. The cast is exceptionally good, and the audience testify their appreciation by frequent encores. Miss Marie Bramah, as Clairette, is charming. Her personal attractions are of no mean order, and she possesses a sweet soprano voice, which she uses to the best advantage. Miss Aubrey is graceful as Lange, while Amaranthe is intrusted to Miss Annetta Gwilt. It is seldom we have seen the market-woman played with more vivacity and spirit, and Miss Gwilt fully deserves the hearty applause and unanimous encore she nightly gains for "The legend of Mère Angot." Her voice is a contralto, rich in tone, and very powerful, and has been evidently highly cultivated. Of Mr Bedford's Ange Pitou, we must speak in terms of unqualified praise. The remaining characters are efficiently filled.

"IS ENGLISH OPERA TO DIE OUT?"—NO!

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

SIR,—In your valuable journal, in the year of grace, 1872—or disgrace, I should say—you kindly published my first letter—"Is English Opera to Die out?" When I wrote that letter I felt fully assured the time was not far distant when something would be done for English author and musician. You had your sly joke and hearty laugh at my "well-meant but total want of knowledge of the musical taste of the country." I have worried you from time to time with letters upon the same subject, and "poor Miss English Opera" has sent forth her melancholy wail from the "door-step" of the haunted house in the Haymarket, where the ghosts of the departed great singers are said to assemble, gnash their teeth, tear their hair, and rattle their bony limbs furiously, and then vanish in disgust at seeing the very walls of the once famed opera house crumbling to decay. Passing the other evening, I saw my old lady friend sitting up, looking quite sprightly, and chuckling to herself, "Let it crumble—let it crumble to decay, and perish! and with it that wonderful genius 'Idealizer,' so learned in facts and figures, and who talked such learned nonsense about England having no singers, no composers, no authors." What I said in my letter was, "There should be a theatre connected with the Royal Academy of Music, for the careful training of those students who show unmistakable signs of talent for the stage. The theatre should be opened all the year round, at moderate charges. There should be no favouritism shown to authors or composers," &c.

I see by your leader of Saturday, the 23rd, there is every hope of really something being done to once more raise "poor Miss English Opera" from the "door-step" of the "haunted house," and place her upon the pedestal of fame, amidst lovely groves, the air fragrant with perfume and exquisite melody, sung by English nightingales to the sweet notes culled from English brains.—Yours, &c., R. C.

MUNICH.—The Intendant General has resolved that henceforth he will give every year, during the period from the 16th August to the 18th September, 35 performances of such operatic and dramatic works as have been got up with regard to the acting, singing, and mise-en-scène, at the Theatre Royal, in what may be considered a model manner. The 35 performances will be divided into 5 series of 7 each, and in each series 3 of the performances will be dedicated to opera and 4 to the drama.

DRESDEN.—Herr Riese has been re-engaged for eight years at the Royal Opera, and, moreover, gratified with the title of Royal Chamber Singer. During his recent visit to Vienna, the Count von Platen, Intendant of the Theatres Royal, engaged Mdlle Oberneeder as lyrico-dramatic singer for the Royal Operahouse. The young lady was a pupil of Mad. Marchesi's at the Imperial Conservatory of Music in the Austrian capital.—Beethoven's Trio, Op. 70. No. 2, Sebastian Bach's grand Duo-Sonata, No. 3, in E major, and J. Raff's Pianoforte Quartet, Op. 107, were included in the programme of the second of the series of Trio-Soirées now being given by Herren L. Rollfuss, E. Feigerl, and F. Böckmann.—On his passage through here to Vienna, Herr Joachim gave two most numerously attended concerts.

MUSIC IN MANCHESTER.

(From our Correspondent.)

Since the date of my last letter, several interesting concerts have been given here, and though we are more than half way through the musical season, the most brilliant period has probably got to come. At Mr Hallé's last Choral Concert, the Hymn of Praise and the Stabat Mater were given—whose Stabat Mater there is as little need to say as whose Hymn of Praise. In a musical city like this, these works are of course very familiar, and I believe there never was a performance of either of them in the Free Trade Hall about which somebody did not say it was the very best ever heard in Manchester. This was said more than once after the last Choral Concert, and I for one am not prepared to deny it of either of these two great works. Last week we heard, for the first here, Berlioz's symphony, Harold in Italy. With the first three movements of this remarkable work, everybody was delighted, but some thought there was an ante-climax in the finale. I often envy the critics who can predict the verdict of posterity on a music composition on a first hearing; or, to speak more precisely, who have confidence in their own predictions. But I will not echo the opinions I have heard about the prospects of Harold in the future. I can, however, have no hesitation in saying that Mr Hallé's splendid band never played more magnificently than in this comparatively unknown work, and that Herr Straus, in the viola obbligato—which is continued through all the movements—was, as he always is, intelligent, artistic, and effective. Weber's Jubel-overture opened the second part, and the majority of the audience arose when—to their surprise apparently—they heard the familiar National Anthem, with which it concludes, forgetting, by the way, that this overture was an "occasional" piece in honour of a King of Saxony. The concert was delightfully varied by a splendid performance of Beethoven's sonata, "Les Adieux, l'Absence, et le Retour," by Mr Hallé, and by the fine singing of Mdlle Tietjens and Mdme Trebelli-Bettini. Here is the programme for this week's concert.

The Ninth Symphony in D minor, for orchestra, solo voices, and chorus (Beethoven)—Principal vocalists, Mdme Otto Alvsleben, Miss Thorley, Mr Vernon Rigby, and Mr Santley; Overture, Michael Angelo (first time) (Gade); Air, "Un aura amorosa" (Cosi fan Tutte) (Mozart)—Mr Vernon Rigby; Chorus, "The Charge of the Light Brigade" (Tennyson) (Edward Hecht); Air, "Non mi dir" (Don Giovanni) (Mozart)—Mdme Alvsleben; Part-songs, "My true love has my heart" (Gounod) and "The Bells of St Michael's Tower" (Knyvett)—Arranged and newly harmonized by Sir R. Stewart; Air, "Oh, Lisbona" (Don Sebastiano) (Donizetti)—Mr Santley; March and Chorus, Tannhäuser (first time complete) (Wagner).

Mr de Jong's recent concerts have been very well attended; at the last but one the hall was crowded to excess, the attraction being Mr Mapleson's concert party, including Mdlle Tietjens, Mdme Trebelli, Signori Catalani and Perkins. A Belgian violinist, M. Colyns, also appeared with success. On Saturday last, the Dublin Glee and Madrigal Union appeared for the first time in Manchester, but the applause which followed the finished singing of this excellent glee society very decidedly expressed the hope of the audience that Mr de Jong would invite them to pay us another visit.

An admirable series of classical chamber concerts has been announced at the Town Hall, under the direction of Mr Frederick Unyer, an accomplished pianist and composer, who has also been a very successful teacher here for many years.

MUSIC AT BOULOGNE-SUR-MER.

(From a Correspondent.)

In my account of Herr Reichardt's splendid and very successful concert given on January 15, at the Etablissement des Bains, I finished my remarks by stating that he had made his bed "at the Hôpital St Louis for some poor vieillard or orphan." I was not then aware of the amount he had gained for his charitable object, but I gather from a letter from the great artist himself published in all the local journals, in which, worded with his usual good taste, he proffers his thanks to all the artists and amateurs who so generously assisted him in his good work, that the success had surpassed all his expectations, so that after establishing the said bed at a cost of 3,000 fr., and deducting all expenses connected with the concert, he had a sum of 500 fr. left in his hands. This amount he generously divided as follows:—Caisse des Orphelines, 100 fr.; Sailors' Institute, 100 fr.; British Free School, 100 fr.; à l'hospice pour extra aux vieillards et convalescents, 100 fr.; à la veuve —— —— 100 fr.

So great was the satisfaction of all present on Friday, January 15, that already several amateurs of good music are talking of soliciting Herr Reichardt to undertake another concert during Lent, at which we should hope to hear M. Gounod's Gallia repeated and brought more prominently forward in the programme, so that we may have a better opportunity of judging of a great work of a truly great composer.

M. Troy has had good success lately at the Salle Monsigny. Being the director of no less than four theatres in the north of France (Boulogne, Calais, Dunkerque, and St Omer), and the theatres not being open every night, he has the great advantage of frequently changing his artists. Our present troupe is decidedly the best we have had for some time. Last night Les deux Orphelines was given with a spirit and go I have seldom seen here. M. Troy himself played the villain Jacques, with tact and good taste, and was ably supported by all his company. The character of Pierre, his unfortunate, crippled brother, was undertaken by M. Moreau, who showed by his calm, quiet acting in the first part of the play, and his frenzy in the last act but one, when he kills his elder brother, how well he had studied the character. Mdlle Filhod, as the "Comtesse," was all that a Comtesse should be. Mdme Montigaud, as La Frochard, was inimitable;—her make-up, her voice, and gestures were perfect. The audience were quite carried away by her acting. They entered so entirely into the idea and spirit of the piece that, when she pulled by the arm roughly, and finally pushed the poor blind Orpheline into a garret, they began to hiss. Les deux Orphelines were charmingly played by Mdlles Albianne (Henriette), and Laurent (Louise).

Mdlle Scrivaneck, who is still travelling with M. Troy, gave us a treat on Saturday last by her wonderful impersonation of Gentil Bernard, in which she assumes no less than seven different characters. La Bataille de Dames, by Scribe and Legouvé, and La belle Mère a des Ecus—both well played—make up our theatrical week.

The ball I announced to take place last week, got up by the English inhabitants, in return for the magnificent reception given to the Lord Mayor, on January 11, has been abandoned—owing, so says the local press, to the serious illness of Prince Leopold. The fourteen gentlemen who formed the committee, having put down the sum of £2 each, would not receive back their subscriptions, but made a donation of the same to the Maire, for the poor of Boulogne.

Prospective arrangements—Ball given by the Sous-Prefet, M. le Baron de Latouche, on February 3rd; Bal du Commerce, February 6. At the Theatre, in rehearsal, La Princesse de Trébizonde (operette), Les idées d'une Comtesse (comedie), Benvenuto Cellini (drama), and La maîtresse légitime.

Boulogne-sur-Mer, 27th January, 1875.

HAMBURGH.—Last September, Sig. Pollini entered upon the management of the Stadttheater. The building itself, entirely repaired and re-decorated by the Joint-Stock Company, to whom it belongs, was as bright as a new pin. But everything in it, dresses, scenery, and properties, was utterly ruined by more than forty years' wear and tear. The whole stock had, therefore, to be renewed. Then an opera company, a dramatic company, and a ballet company, had to be recruited from all parts of Germany. It was no easy matter to form a satisfactory repertory with so many artists perfect strangers to each other. Nevertheless, from September 16th, 1874, to the 1st January, 1875, the manager has produced 18 grand operas, 1 one-act opera, 3 operettas, 10 grand dramatic works, and 5 one or two act pieces, to wit: Lohengrin (7 times), Les Huguenots (4 times), Faust (4 times), Il Trovatore (3 times), Guillaume Tell (twice), Das Nachtlager in Granada (4 times), Fidelio (twice), Le Nozze (3 times), Der Freischütz (twice), Tannhäuser (twice), Le Postillon de Longjumeau (6 times), Don Juan (6 times), La Dame Blanche (4 times), Die Zauberflöte (5 times), Hans Heiling (twice), Fra Diavolo (twice), Czar und Zimmermann (4 times), La Juive (twice), La Fille de Mdme Angot (9 times), Fleurette, and Das Pensionat. There was, also, a grand Christmas fairy piece, Prinzessin Tausendschön, and a grand ballet, Nymphen am See. As every work had to be studied and rehearsed as if it was a perfect novelty, it is very evident that neither Sig. Pollini nor his artists can be accused of indolence.

THE PROPOSED NEW OPERAHOUSE.

Everybody—whether, like John Gilpin's spouse, of "frugal mind," or of those æsthetic tastes which are not always economical—will be glad to know that a portion of the reclaimed land on the Thames Embankment is likely to be turned to a good purpose without further delay. It is no secret that, for a long time past, Mr Mapleson, in association with certain influential supporters of the lyric drama, has been looking for a place where Her Majesty's Opera might be located en permanence. The accommodation afforded at Drury Lane ever since the destruction of "the old house in the Haymarket" seven years ago, though good as a makeshift, left much to be desired in many respects, and from the first there could not have existed any idea of looking upon the tenancy of Mr Chatterton's theatre as other than a temporary arrangement pending the re-erection of that over which Lord Dudley holds present sway. Why the new Her Majesty's Theatre remains empty—or perhaps we should say why it was built so that nobody could inhabit it—is a question scarcely worth the trouble of discussion. Enough that when the workmen turned it out of hand, Her Majesty's Opera preferred to remain in "Old Drury," and its manager resolved to look elsewhere for a permanent home. Various sites were proposed from time to time, but the exigencies of an operahouse are, in this respect, not easily satisfied. An operahouse not only wants room for itself, but for those who would reach it with ease and comfort; it must be readily accessible from the best quarters of town, and its surroundings should not present too great a contrast with the luxurious enjoyment purveyed. The difficulty in crowded London was to satisfy such demands at other than an absurdly extravagant cost, and this difficulty existed long after the vacant spaces of the Thames Embankment began to cry out for some one to come and build upon them. The Embankment was all very well, but how was it to be reached? To this question no answer came till the Metropolitan Board of Works resolved upon the new street from Charing Cross. Then the aspect of affairs entirely changed, and the "magnificent vacancy" lying between the proposed thoroughfare and the St Stephen's Club presented every advantage for which Mr Mapleson and his friends had looked so long in vain. No better site for an operahouse could be found throughout the length and breadth of London. The space, both for the building and its approaches, is ample; while the access to it from those parts of London where opera-goers chiefly reside leaves nothing to desire; proximity to the Houses of Parliament being a specially important consideration. Looking at facts so important and indisputable, it is not surprising to find Mr Mapleson in treaty with the Board of Works for possession of the land, and that at length more than a probability exists of London having an operahouse as well situated and, in all essentials, as complete as the sumptuous building lately opened in Paris. If we are rightly informed, the actual transfer of the site has not yet been made; but, having regard to the purpose for which it is sought, the high character of those who promote the scheme, and the public spirit of the Board of Works, it can hardly be supposed that anything will hinder the realization of hopes which rumour long ago excited among the connoisseurs of opera.

With respect to the dimensions and architectural claims of the proposed building, nothing can be said now. It must be obvious, moreover, that any intentions whatever as regards a scheme at present existing only on paper are liable to change; but there is reason to believe that efforts will be made to obtain results of a kind quite unique in this country. We have never yet had a national operahouse, nor, in the fullest sense of the term, are we likely to have one for a long while. Opera in England must, under present circumstances, be either foreign, pur et simple, or foreign in an English dress. This, however, should not hinder any effort to change the circumstances, and the new enterprise contemplates, besides the performance of English or quasi-English operas during the off-season, the establishment of an academy for the training of native artists, both vocalists and dancers. This project goes straight to the root of the matter. We shall never have a national opera till there is a national stage, with people upon it who are decently able, at least, to do their work. Let these essentials be provided—in other words, let our composers have a chance for their productions, and we believe the musical talent of England will make English opera a very different thing to what it now is. The entire artistic direction of the enterprise having been undertaken by Sir Michael Costa, we may confidently look for the greatest energy in its management. A better administrator than the Neapolitan gentleman who has become an English knight could hardly be found. Included in the scheme are other features, such as an ornamental garden and a grand café; but upon these we do not now propose to dwell; nor for them, comparatively speaking, do we greatly care. Our only anxiety at present, and that of all who desire the prosperity of lyric drama, is to see Mr Mapleson and his friends empowered to begin operations. The Board of Works has done much for London from an æsthetic point of view; it can now materially add to the obligation by sanctioning a scheme worthy, for many reasons, of unqualified support.

ORIGIN OF TOASTS.

At first sight, the incongruity between the meanings attached to the word "toast" would seem to be irreconcilable; it is none the less true that one was born of the other. Toasted bread and toasted biscuit were as necessary to many an old English drink as roasted apples were to the wassail bowl. Rochester carved a drinking-cup

"So large, that, filled with sack
Up to the swelling brim,
Vast toasts on the delicious lake,
Like ships at sea, may swim!"

A poetaster, inspired by punch, describes the gods assembled in solemn conclave to test the worth of the newly-invented beverage; Apollo contributed water from Parnassus, Juno finds lemons, Venus sugar white as her own doves; Bacchus brings wine, Mars brandy, Saturn a few nutmegs, and then

"Neptune this ocean of liquor did crown
With a hard-baked biscuit well browned in the sun:"

their united efforts producing a liquor, the first taste of which made Jupiter declare that heaven was never true heaven before.

The connection of a toast with drinking is therefore one of ancient standing; but it was not until the beginning of the last century that the word made its first step towards its present meaning; for in 1709 the Tatler speaks of it as a new name found out by the wits to make a lady's name as effective as borage in a glass when a man is drinking. According to the same authority, the new form of gallantry sprung from the freak of a half-fuddled worshipper of the sex. A celebrated beauty dabbling in the public waters at Bath, one of her admirers filled a glass with water from the bath and drank it to the fair one's health. Another young fellow, not to be outdone, swore that though he did not like the liquor, he would have the toast, and tried to jump into the bath to the lady. He was prevented doing so; but from that time, every lady whose charms offered an excuse for a glass in her honour was dubbed "a toast." Arbuthnot, rhyming about a once famous club, says:—

"Whence deathless Kit-kat took his name,
Few critics can unriddle;
Some say from pastrycook it came,
And some from Cat and Fiddle.
From no trim beaux its name it bears,
Grey statesmen or green wits;
But from the pell-mell pack of toasts,
Of old Cats and young Kits."

The Kit-kat toasts were elected by a majority of votes, and their names inscribed, with some complimentary verses beneath, upon the drinking-glasses of the club. Once allied to the pledging of a lady's health, it was easy for the word to slip into its more general meaning, and so "a toast" came to mean any home sentiment evoked by the command:—

"Give the Toast, my good fellow; be jovial and gay,
And let the brisk moments pass jocund away!"

PALERMA.—The first stone of a new theatre was laid here on the 12th ult.

DESSAU.—Herr Theodor Wachtel, Jun., has just died of pulmonary consumption at the age of thirty. Like his father, he began his theatrical career in Hamburgh. He was then engaged at the Theatre here, but was compelled, last summer, by failing health, to retire from the stage.

STUTTGART.—161 fresh pupils were admitted last autumn into the Conservatory of Music, which is under the especial patronage of the King. The number of students is now 576, being 68 more than last year. Of these, 182 intend to follow music as a profession, 62 being males and 120 females, while 133 are not natives of Wurtemberg. Of the students generally, 306 belong to this town, and 32 to other parts of Wurtemberg. 10 come from Baden; 11 from Bavaria; 1 from Hesse; 22 from Prussia; 1 from Brunswick; 3 from Bremen; 6 from the Saxon Duchies; 2 from Hamburgh; 1 from Austria; 35 from Switzerland; 1 from France; 53 from Great Britain; 1 from the Netherlands; 10 from Russia; 1 from Turkey; 79 from North America; and 1 from Africa. During the winter session, 706 lessons are given every week by 34 masters and 5 assistant-masters.

One of the most interesting features of the Royal Albert Hall concert, on Tuesday last, was Herr Wilhelmj's splended performance of a violin concerto by Herr Hégar, of Zurich, which, doubtless, will be heard again.

Mr Franklin Taylor will be the pianist at the Monday Popular Concert on Monday evening.

M. Pasdeloup has put Mr Alfred Holmes's second symphony in rehearsal. English art is going ahead in Paris.

The British Orchestral Society will perform Mr Alfred Holmes's symphony, Robin Hood, at one of its concerts next month.

The death of Mr Webster, of the firm of Wilkie, Webster & Allan, the oldest established music warehouse in Melbourne (Australia), is announced.

Mr Alfred Holmes's symphony-cantata, Jeanne d'Arc, will be produced at the Crystal Palace on the 26th inst. Madame Sherrington will sing the music of the heroine.

Miss Annetta Gwilt, who is "starring" in the provinces, has made a "hit" in the part of Amaranthe (La Fille de Madame Angot). The capital style in which she sings the Legende de la Mère Angot "brings down the house" on each occasion.

It is said (by the Arcadian) that Mr Gye is trying to negotiate with Mdme Lucca for the next season. That wayward little lady owes him a forfeit for breaking her engagement, but doubtless he will forgive that and welcome her to the fold with outstretched arms.

Signor Urio—writes a provincial journal, in its notice of a local concert—proved that the reputation he has gained in this country is well bestowed, the "Rose song" (from Il Talismano), being given in perfect style, and calling forth the heartiest plaudits of the audience.

A new weekly journal, to be entitled The Magpie, is announced to appear next Saturday, the 13th inst. Its columns are to be devoted to politics, science, music, the drama, literature, etc. The names of the proprietors and contributors announced to carry on the work, and who have been connected for years with some of our best daily and weekly publications, are a guarantee for the sound principles on which the new journal is likely to be conducted.

His Excellency the Italian Minister, accompanied by Sir Michael Costa, on Saturday last honoured Mr Fredk. Godfrey with a visit to hear the rehearsal of a new march composed by Sir Michael at the express command of his Majesty the King of Italy. On leaving, both Sir Michael and his Excellency expressed their high gratification at the able and efficient manner in which the Coldstreams, under the leadership of Mr F. Godfrey, had realised the views of the composer.

The Welsh people of the State of Wisconsin and Northern Illinois held their first annual Esteddfod in Milwaukee, at the Academy of Music on Christmas day. In its native country the institution is of many centuries standing, and is still as popular among the masses of the nation as ever. A number of prominent men took part in the exercises on Christmas day at Milwaukee, also some of the best musicians of the North-west. Miss Anna S. Lewis was one who represented Chicago at the gathering.

While on the subject of national music schools we may remark we have not heard lately anything of the Cole-Freake scheme. How far it is progressing here or elsewhere we cannot say, but when we have an established institution like the Royal Academy of Music, which has done such good service to art, and only wants further development in the way of scholarships, and that country aid which is being sought for on behalf of the new untried school, we feel regret that there should be any diversion of funds from what is known to be a valuable institution. The adoption of Mr Freake's building by Government, and the establishment of a local music school here, five years hence, in connection with the head academy, are at best very doubtful events, and will hardly compensate us for the delay or expense, even if attained, however it may suit others. London professors and managerial staff will have received £2,000 of Liverpool money, and London lodging-house keepers the profits of boarding the students sent up.—Liverpool Daily Post.

It was believed by some of Mr Tennyson's friends that he would accept a baronetcy, not because he personally desired it, but for his successors; and we are somewhat surprised, therefore, to see that he has declined it. We perceive that the papers are making capital out of these proffered honours to literature from the Conservative Government; but we believe it is no secret that Mr Tennyson had already been offered a baronetcy by the Liberal Government, but had declined it. The hereditary dignity was pressed upon Mr Tennyson because he has a family; and he is, we have reason to know, sufficiently wealthy to keep up the honour. Mr Carlyle, having no descendants, was offered a knighthood and G.C.B. There is not the slightest surprise expressed anywhere that the philosopher of Chelsea should have declined the marks of his Sovereign's consideration, for he has always inveighed against titles. One order he does possess, however, which he regards with real favour, and that is the order of the Iron Crown, conferred upon him by the Emperor of Germany, for his Life of Frederick the Great.

The death of Herr Leopold Jansa, for many years a resident in this country, and well known as an accomplished violinist, took place last month in Vienna. Herr Jansa, who was in his eightieth year, was a member of the Royal Prussian Court Chapel, and Honorary Professor in the Conservatory of Music.

The excitement in Worcester, consequent upon the refusal of the Dean and Chapter to grant the use of the Cathedral for the Festival of the Three Choirs, which should, in turn, have taken place there during the present year, still continues; and—from the determined atitude of those who assume that possession is, in this case, even more than "nine points" of the law—it appears not likely to subside. Meetings have been held, and conferences with the small opposing clerical body have taken place, but without effect; the latest news being that a petition to the Queen has been presented, with the hope of inducing her to persuade the Dean and Chapter to listen to the voice of the majority upon a matter so important, not only to sacred musical art, but to the Charity for the benefit of which these Festivals were instituted. Meanwhile we cannot but express surprise at the bland manner in which the three Choirs, after having had an effectual stop put to the continuance of the Festival in the old form, have been requested to aid in establishing the new. Turning a person out of the home which for years he has occupied with honour to himself and all around him, may be one of those periodical exercises of despotic authority which it is better to bear with fortitude; but to call upon his best and truest friends to help in getting the house ready for another is an experiment which even a Dean and Chapter can hardly hope to prove successful.—Musical Times.

In a little paper in the Era Almanack, Mr Clement Scott—writing on a subject which will interest many playgoers—puts in his plea for the pit; the pit which in recent years has been treated somewhat scurvily in our theatres. The pit used to be a power, and even now the most habitual and devoted playgoers probably frequent it. Mr Scott is jealous for its privileges, for he writes:—"Had not the position of the pit been sadly altered, had not the conditions of pit criticism been changed, had not the voice of the pit been stifled, many of the recent scandals would have been avoided, and we should not have found, as now, a kind of civil war being waged in all matters of theatrical interest—on the one side, those who love the art; on the other, those who view it merely as a commercial speculation, or possibly something worse. Had the pit been left in its old form and strength, had this large and generous assemblage with no piques or prejudices, been permitted to remain and watch with eager eyes over the interests of art, the difficulties of the critic would in a great measure have been removed, and all authoritative interference would have been unnecessary. Let us see, however, what has been done with the poor old pit, what treatment has been extended to the honest gentlemen who, in fair weather and foul, have remained at the helm of the dramatic ship. They have been driven back, back, by these 10s stalls, until the place of the pit is a pen, and the pit's protection is no longer a power."

London—says the Arcadian—has lost one of her best-known and most respected citizens by the death of Mr John Mitchell, the publisher, librarian, and theatrical agent of Old Bond Street. Mr Mitchell entered into the employment of Mr Sams, as a shop-boy, nearly sixty years ago, but speedily won promotion, until he became the partner of his employer, and at his death the sole successor to the business. Although Mr Mitchell kept a shop (a thing looked upon with horror by aristocratic society), and was not in manner and appearance anything more than a formal tradesman of the old school, he was the trusted friend of the Queen and every member of the royal family. Scarcely anything of importance was ever bought by them without "old Mitchell's" approval had been first secured, and he was a kind of adviser-in-chief upon matters of taste to all the "Upper Ten." He had a lovely country house not far from Windsor, and there, when they were young, the princes and princesses spent many happy days. The Queen used often to visit him, and of late years the Princess of Wales and her children have taken the places of the latters' uncles and aunts. While dukes and marquises have been contesting for the honour of royal visits, plain old John Mitchell has enjoyed a large share of royalty's leisure moments. He was a short, stout, genial old gentleman, with white hair and a merry twinkle in his eye, a florid complexion, and a smooth face. His age is said to have been sixty-eight, but he has looked as old as that for many years past. During more than twenty seasons he directed French plays at the St James's and other theatres, bringing over the best companies obtainable, and having had the honour of being the first manager to introduce Rachel to an English audience. He was also a liberal supporter of the opera-houses, which, indeed, would often have collapsed but for his assistance. At Covent Garden he took for each season from a quarter to a third of the house, as all the most fashionable people secured their seats through him. It is thought that he will have left a large fortune, but the particulars have not yet transpired.

Signor Caravoglio has been singing at Wigan. The Wigan Examiner praises him highly, and writes:—

Signor Caravoglio, the baritone, was, however, perhaps the most popular vocalist of the evening, his three songs being vociferously re-demanded. He possesses a voice of wide scale, and of much power and flexibility, and though his abilities were most severely tested by his musical selections, amongst which was "Largo al factotum" (Il Barbiere), he proved himself a perfect master of everything he attempted. He gave also a superb rendering of Mattei's "Non e ver."

The Brighton railway company have announced special facilities for visitors to Mr Kuhe's grand Musical Festival. Cheap first class tickets, available for a fortnight, will be issued from all stations in the district of Brighton, available to travel by any train and on any day within the fourteen days. Fortnightly cheap first class tickets will also be issued from the London stations, Croydon, &c., to Brighton, at special low fares. For each of the evening concerts, return tickets, irrespective of distance, will be available for two days. For the morning concerts, on Saturdays, Feb. 13th and 20th, first class return tickets from London stations to Brighton will be issued at a special cheap rate of 10s. 6d. Late trains will run from Brighton on each evening of the concerts.

BRUSSELS.—The public of the Théâtre Royal de la Monnaie have at length been gratified by a sensation. It may not have been a very overpowering sensation, but it was sufficient to infuse a little animation into the usual course of things lyric at the above establishment. The said sensation was the appearance of M. Sylva, of the Grand Opera, Paris, as the hero in Meyerbeer's Robert le Diable. The gentleman's success was by no means diminished by the fact of his being a brave Belge, born at Grammont (Eastern Flanders) in 1844. He attended the Brussels Conservatory, where, in 1866, he gained the prizes for singing and elocution. He then went to Paris to study under Duprez. In 1867, he made his début at Nantes. He was the fort ténor at Lyons, in 1868 and 1869; at the Hague, in 1870; and at Lille in 1871. He has been engaged at the Grand Opera, Paris, since 1872. The only drawback to the pleasure experienced by a sympathizing public of fellow-countrymen is that previous engagements prevent his singing here for more than a few times. M. Echetto was a satisfactory Bertram. Mdlle Hamaekers, also, did well what she had to do. Halévy's opera, La Reine de Chypre, is to be produced with entirely new scenery, dresses and decorations, for which the Corporation will pay, as they are bound to do by the agreement entered into between them and M. Campocasso, the manager. La Perle du Brésil is still in rehearsal. According to all appearance, Mdlle Priola will have sufficiently recovered from her indisposition to sustain the part of the heroine, so that Mdlle Reine, who has understudied the part, will have had her trouble for nothing.—Not a place was to be had long before they came off for love or money for the gala performances on the 3rd February, in honour of the marriage of the Princess Louise.—Sig. Smeccchia and his Italian operatic company have not produced a too favourable impression. But they have been patronized by the higher classes, and this has saved their visit here from being as disastrous, pecuniarily speaking, as it otherwise might have proved.—The programme of the fourth Concert Populaire was not very interesting. The principal features in it were a Violin Concerto, by Lalo, an overture, entitled "Michael Angelo," by Niels Gade, and an Adagio added by M. Anton Rubinstein to his symphony called "The Ocean." M. P. Sarasate was the solo-violinist.

THE FORMATION AND CULTIVATION OF THE VOICE FOR SINGING

Price 12s.

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, REGENT STREET, W.

"The remarkable qualities of this book are the author's freedom from conventional trammels, the strong sense of his opinions, and the novelty yet evident soundness of his precepts; his work has consequently come into general use as a manual of vocal instruction."—Daily News.

DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE,

For invigorating and enriching the voice, and removing affections of the throat.

DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE is universally acknowledged to be the most valuable remedy for sore throat, hoarseness and relaxed throat. It should always be taken before singing or reciting, as it strengthens the vocal organs. It is most extensively prescribed by the faculty for the throat and voice. Dr Lewis of Basingstoke says he finds them most efficacious, and in Dr Copland's Dictionary of Practical Medicine (Longman & Co.), they are strongly recommended at pages 872 and 1492. They are used by all the greatest vocalists and orators in Europe, and have been established over a quarter of a century. Testimonials from Patti, Grisi, Lablache, Santley, &c. Sold in boxes, 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. by all Chemists throughout the United Kingdom and the Colonies.

ROMANCE.

Composed by ALEXANDER REICHARDT.

SUNG BY MDLLE CARLOTTA PATTI.

A peine ai-je vu le printemps
Couvrir dix fois de leur feuillage
Les vieux saules de nos étangs,
Que, sans pitié pour mon jeune âge,
Dieu m'a ravi le guide aimé
Qui me prodiguait ses tendresses!
Je pleure son regard charmé!
Je ne reçois plus ses caresses!

Ainsi parlait, en gémissant,
Une orpheline désolée;
Mais un bel ange, l'embrassant,
Lui dit, d'une voix inspirée:
"Ne pleure plus et sois ma sœur
Ma mère sera notre mère,
Et tu verras que du bonheur
Il en est encor sur la terre!"

Funeral of the late Sir W. Sterndale Bennett,

AT WESTMINSTER ABBEY,

By the kind permission of the VERY REV. THE DEAN OF WESTMINSTER.

ON SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 6TH, 1875.

REQUISITION.

To the VERY REV. THE DEAN OF WESTMINSTER.

WE, the undersigned, are strongly of opinion that the Interment of the Late SIR STERNDALE BENNETT, Professor of Music in the University of Cambridge, M.A., Mus. D., D.C.L., and Principal of the Royal Academy of Music, (who was unquestionably at the head of the Musical Profession in England,) in the Abbey Church of Westminster would be a fitting tribute to the genius and worth of this gifted Englishman; and, on more public grounds, a just recognition of the Art of which he was so distinguished an Ornament.

(Signed) His Royal Highness the Duke of Edinburgh, Earl of Dudley, Lord Coleridge, Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol, G. A. Macfarren, Sir Julius Benedict, Walter Macfarren, G. F. Anderson, Lucy Anderson, A. Randegger, Otto Goldschmidt, Jenny Goldschmidt-Lind, G. A. Osborne, W. G. Cusins, J. T. Willy, W. F. Low, J. Lamborn Cock, F. R. Cox, W. Dorrell, Brinley Richards, E. OUTER COFFIN.—French polished oak, with projecting lid and plinth; polished silvered mountings, consisting of chaste handles and corner clasps (Messrs Hatchards', the undertakers, own design); monogram, &c., and shield-shaped plate, with engraved inscription :—

SIR
WILLIAM STERNDALE
BENNETT, KT.,
BORN 13TH APRIL,
1816,
DIED 1ST FEBRUARY,
1875.

The sides of the coffin were festooned with white lilac blossoms, and the lid was partly hidden by wreaths of choice flowers sent by—

The University of Edinburgh.
The Lady Students of the Royal Academy of Music.
Queen's College.
The German Athenæum.
And many Private Friends.

When the coffin was placed in the open hearse, and borne into the Abbey, a violet-lined velvet pall, fringed with white silk, was laid on it, leaving exposed bright silvered work and chaplets of flowers—wreaths depending on either side. The Dean, Clergy, &c., met the Funeral at the West Cloister Door.

The usual Croft and Purcell Music was done at the Funeral. Purcell's Burial Chant from the 90th Psalm. After the Lesson, the Anthem, "God is a Spirit," by Sterndale Bennett, and sung by Master Beckham, Messrs Foster, Carter, and Lawler. On reaching the Grave, the "Croft" Music was resumed, and immediately before "The grace of our Lord," part of Handel's Funeral Anthem, "His body is buried in peace" was sung at the Grave. Dead March on Organ.

The Body and the Mourners, after the Choir Anthem, passed through the North Transept Gate to the Grave. The Choir and Clergy through the West Gate of the Choir (under the Organ) meeting the Body and Mourners at the Grave.

Mr Turle presided at the Organ, and Mr Montem Smith had the general directing of the Choirs, which were as follows :—

ORGANISTS.—T. Turle, Esq., Dr Stainer, E. J. Hopkins, Esq., Geo. Cooper, Esq., J. Hopkins, Esq. (Rochester), and Dr C. Steggall.

ALTO.—Messrs Barnby, Baxter, Foster, and Large (Westminster); Mr Stilliard (St Paul's); Mr Hodges (Chapel Royal); Mr Ball (Lincoln's Inn).

TENOR.—Messrs Montem Smith, Carter and Mason (Westminster); Messrs Walker and Kenningham (St Paul's); Mr Beckett (Chapel Royal); Messrs Coates and Guy (Lincoln's Inn).

BASS.—Messrs Whitehouse, Lawler, Hilton, and Bell (Westminster); Messrs Winn, De Lacey, Thurley Beale, and Kempton (St Paul's); Mr Distin (Lincoln's Inn); Mr Lewis Thomas (Temple).

Total—28 boys, and 26 men.

Black carpeting was laid throughout the Abbey for the procession. The Grave was draped with black, bordered with grey.

The whole of the arrangements were under the superintendence of MR JOHN GILL, Secretary of the Royal Academy of Music, and MR STANLEY LUCAS, Secretary of the Philharmonic Society, and the Royal Society of Musicians of Great Britain.

The Funeral was conducted by Mr S. HATCHARD, of 47, Crawford Street, Bryanston Square, and the excellent manner in which all the arrangements were carried out gave general satisfaction.

On Sunday afternoon, at 3 o'clock, the Bishop of Ely (including Cambridge in his Diocese), preached with distinct reference to the Funeral of the preceding day. Before the Sermon, that is, after the 3rd Collect, Bennett's "Abide with me," from the Woman of Samaria, was sung; and, after the Services, Battishill's Anthem, "Behold, how good and joyful," with the verse set by Montem Smith.

FUNERAL OF SIR STERNDALE BENNETT.

(From the "Daily Telegraph.")

On Saturday, at noon, the mortal remains of our famous English composer were laid to rest, with becoming rites, amid universal sympathy. Among the feelings excited by the news of Sterndale Bennett's death was a desire that the last honours paid to him should be worthy of his genius, and a general wish arose to bury him in Westminster Abbey, that his dust might mingle with the dust of others who have helped to make bright the pages of our "rough island story." The idea was acted upon, and very soon a requisition, signed by about seventy persons, among whom were the Duke of Edinburgh, Lord Dudley, Lord Coleridge, the Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol, Sir Julius Benedict, Sir John Goss, Sir Henry Thompson, and Sir Francis Grant, was transmitted to Dean Stanley, urging that the burial of Sir Sterndale Bennett's remains in the Abbey Church of Westminster "would be a fitting tribute to the genius and worth of this gifted Englishman, and, on more public grounds, a just recognition of the art of which he was so distinguished an ornament." The honour thus sought is never lightly bestowed, but Dean Stanley did not hesitate to grant it in the case of our departed master; and so it comes to pass that all that was mortal of Sterndale Bennett reposes amid the crowd of kings and nobles, statesmen and warriors, poets and musicians, who lie beneath the roof of our glorious Abbey.

Great interest was shown by the general public in the funeral ceremony, and the Abbey doors had not been long opened before the nave and transepts were crowded. The choir had been reserved for ticket-holders, but long before the time when the procession was expected, every seat (those set apart for the mourners excepted) had its occupant. Nothing could have been more impressive than the waiting of this great, silent company, in such a place on such an occasion. The day was somewhat cheerful, and the majestic interior stood revealed in all its beauty, as the sun's rays poured through the windows "richly dight," flecking the soaring arches and massive columns with fantastic hues. But the spectacle of the crowd that could be seen, and the consciousness of other crouds that could not be seen, all as still as the dead heroes beneath their feet, and all possessed by one feeling of sympathy with the occasion, must have moved the least emotional onlooker. Meanwhile, through the busy streets leading from St John's Wood, the body of Sterndale Bennett was being conveyed to its last splendid home with fitting reverence. Messrs Hatchard, who conducted the funeral, had provided an open hearse, and on it lay the coffin, partly covered with a violet pall, partly hidden by wreaths and festoons of flowers, which loving hands had placed there in rich profusion. After the hearse came a long array of mourning coaches, twenty-three in number, the rear of the procession being brought up by private carriages, among which were those of Her Majesty the Queen, the Prince of Wales, the Duke of Edinburgh, Lord Dudley, Sir Julius Benedict, &c. The arrival of this imposing cortége at the Abbey was witnessed by a vast crowd of persons who could not be admitted to the interior, but as the police arrangements under Inspector Denning were excellent, the utmost order marked the proceedings, and in a little while the funeral train was prepared to enter the sacred edifice by the cloister door. Of all this the great waiting throng inside were ignorant, as a matter of course. For them there was only silence; and the silence seemed profoundest when Dean Stanley's well-known voice, in tones audible to every one, was heard proclaiming the "comfortable words" with which the Church begins her burial service: "I am the Resurrection and the Life, saith the Lord; He that believeth in Me, though he were dead, yet shall he live. And whomsoever liveth and believeth in Me, shall never die." Then the organ pealed forth, and from the far west of the nave came the strains of Croft's solemn music to the remainder of the introductory sentences. The effect was both beautiful and impressive, as the stately chords followed each other, their order broken now and then seemingly that the distant chapels might faintly echo the music. Very slowly the procession defiled into the nave, headed by a choir numbering fifty-four voices, the Abbey singers having been reinforced by detachments from St Paul's, the Temple, the Chapel Royal, and Lincoln's Inn. Next came the clergy of the Cathedral, with Dean Stanley, and then the coffin—a mass of violet velvet, white silk, and wreaths, crosses, and festoons of flowers. It was right that here there should be nothing sombre and depressing. The dark train of mourners, the black-carpeted path trodden by the procession, and the gloomy attire of the on-looking multitude harmonized with a prevailing sense of loss; but the master himself was being borne to his rest, and his part in the scene was that of a triumph. Like a sunbeam in a dark place, the coffin moved along, the one cheerful feature of the solemn spectacle. Closely surrounding the body, and acting as pall-bearers, marched a number of the deceased musician's fellow-students—those who, having entered upon the battle of life with him, lament a leader. Among them were Messrs G. A. Macfarren, T. Harper, W. H. Holmes, J. Howell, T. M. Mudie, Brinley Richards, and Robert Barnett, after whom came the family of the deceased and a few of his most intimate friends, including Messrs J. W. Davison and Lamborn Cock. In the long array that followed were Col. Colville, representing the Duke of Edinburgh; a deputation from the University of Cambridge headed by the Vice-Chancellor; the directors of the Royal Academy of Music, among whom were the Earl of Dudley and Sir Thomas Gladstone; the committee of the same institution (Messrs H. Leslie, W. Macfarren, &c.); a deputation from the Philharmonic Society, including the directors, conductor (Mr Cusins), and secretary; a deputation from the Royal Society of Musicians, headed by Sir John Goss and Professor Ella; a deputation from the German Athenæum; and the professors of the Royal Academy of Music, including Messrs Sullivan, Randegger, and Sainton. A large proportion of the members of this truly representative gathering carried wreaths or bouquets, and the scene presented when all had taken their places was of a very striking character.

Silence once more reigning throughout the edifice, Mr Turle, who presided at the organ, softly played Purcell's Chant in G minor, to which was sung the psalm, "Domine refugiam," a version of the same chant in the major mode serving for the "Gloria." The lesson having been read, the quartet "God is a Spirit," from the deceased composer's Woman of Samaria, was sung in part by four solo voices, in part by the entire choir. Rendered with great taste, the effect of this beautiful example of religious music was perfect. The soft, sweet strains fell upon all ears with touching eloquence, suggesting, as nothing else could, the rich gifts which were his who lay there under the piled-up flowers. This over, the body and mourners proceeded to the grave, meeting there the choir and clergy, who reached it by another route. A fitting place had been chosen, and Sterndale Bennett rests in goodly company. He lies with Henry Purcell, Croft, Blow, and Arnold, in the narrow aisle connecting the north transept with the nave, and over him day by day through the centuries will

"The pealing organ blow
To the full-voiced choir below."

There could be no better spot in which to bury an English composer, and as, after the body had been lowered to its final resting-place, the majestic music of Purcell and Croft fell on the ear, it seemed that those long-dead masters welcomed their brother into the fellowship of the grave. Now mournful, now exultant, the solemn strains went on to the petition for strength "at our last hour," presently resuming with "I heard a voice from heaven;" after which Dean Stanley continued the service in his most impressive manner. But the musical proceedings were not ended. During the march to the grave Mr Turle had played "Mourn, ye afflicted children," and now it was right that the mighty master lying yonder among the poets should contribute further to the obsequies of his successor. The first subdued chords of "His body is buried in peace" made Handel's presence felt as nothing else could. How grandly the exulting strains set to "But his name liveth evermore" rang out from choir and organ can be imagined; hardly so the cheering effect produced on the vast assembly, who must have recognized that there is something stronger even than death. At the close of the anthem the benediction was pronounced, and, while the Dead March throbbed around, the mourners, raining flowers into the grave, till nothing but flowers could be seen, took a last farewell. In long procession the public followed them, and streamed out into the busy world again, some of them, perhaps, not unmindful of Tennyson's lines—

"He wears a truer crown
Than any wreath that man can weave him.
Speak no more of his renown,
Lay your earthly fancies down,
And in the vast cathedral leave him—
God accept him, Christ receive him."

WILLIAM STERNDALE BENNETT.

(From the "Sunday Times," Feb. 7.)

The whole world of music is in tears. It is not a common grief which it has lately sustained; the loss of the man whose genius upheld the dignity of English music is a calamity which not only his countrymen but all lovers of æsthetic art will mourn. Far and near the praises of William Sterndale Bennett have been sung, and far and near the news of his death will ring a knell in the hearts of those who have known him and loved him, either personally or in his works. It may be said of Bennett that he was the first English composer who shared the highest honours with the recognized leaders of contemporary art, and when it is stated that they were of no lesser weight than Mendelssohn, Schumann, and Hiller, it will be seen to what a height our countryman rose. No one will doubt that it was to his glorious talents that he owed his foreign as well as his native position; and few who are conversant with his works will dispute the fact that, after Mendelssohn's demise, there lived no man fitter to support the prestige of modern music than William Sterndale Bennett. But alas! the years of genius are numbered, like those of ordinary mortals, and sooner or later "Dark cloudy death o'er-shades his beams of life" and removes him from our midst, leaving behind a load of silent sorrow and a world full of regrets. But not all the terrors of death can estrange us from one who, like Bennett, lives in his works a life imperishable, solong as a sense of beauty in art obtains, and so long as music continues to be loved for its own sake, away from factional dissensions and party creeds. Our representative musician died, after a brief illness, on Monday last near the hour of noon. Up to the last few days there was no reason that the catastrophe might not be delayed, if not averted; and, when we took occasion to speak of Bennett's symphony in G minor at the Crystal Palace, there was no certainty that he would not enrich the world's library with another work of the kind. Fate, however, has willed to the contrary, and the hand which wrote the Naïades will hold the pen no more; its pulse is stilled for ever and its work is done. It might not be necessary to speak of a master who exercised less universal sway than did William Sterndale Bennett, at any inordinate length; but we share the sorrow of the time, and feel "the grief that does not speak; whispers the o'er-fraught heart and bids it break."

The few biographical facts which we can relate of a man who, though to the last a servant of the public and a labourer in the art's cause, led a life of comparative seclusion, must be necessarily reflective rather than particular. Bennett was born with musical blood in his veins; his father, Robert Bennett, was an organist in Sheffield, and at an early age, William Sterndale, born on the 13th April, 1816, was admitted to his church as a chorister. Here the first evidences of genius became apparent, and after he had drunk of the bitter cup of misfortune—both his parents being removed while he was still in his childhood—fortune placed it in his power to come up to London and study at the Royal Academy of Music, then under the direction of Dr Crotch. Here young Bennett received instruction from the principal, and also from W. H. Holmes and Cipriani Potter, with others of note. We do not gather that he was remarkably assiduous as a scholar, although his extraordinary aptitude rapidly asserted itself, and work after work flowed from his ready pen. The productions of Bennett's youth are among the most brilliant of his whole career. When we mention his first symphony, in E flat, his concerto for the pianoforte and orchestra in D minor—afterwards published in his Op. 1—and his second concerto in E flat (Op. 4), which he performed at the Philharmonic Concerts—we call to mind works which might have afforded the most mature, most accomplished musician, pride and satisfaction. To this early period belong also the third and fourth concertos (in C minor and F minor respectively), the overtures to the Naïades and Parasina and the Capriccio in E major—works which have become familiar as household words. But it was not only with these treasures of art that Bennett visited Germany in 1836, for, according to Schumann's account in the Neue Zeitschrift für Musik (at the beginning of 1837) he had written six orchestral symphonies and as many orchestral overtures. At Düsseldorf Bennett made the personal acquaintance of Mendelssohn, who already had an immense liking for the young Englishman through his works, and at Leipsic that of Schumann, who was too discriminating and free-minded a critic not to perceive the merit of our countryman. In the article above referred to from the Neue Zeitschrift für Musik—a sort of New Year's greeting, from the editor to his readers—we find not only that Schumann was imbued with a deep admiration for Bennett, but that he was positively enthusiastic about his music. Here is what he had to say, according to "M. E. G.'s" translation:—

"The arts of music and poetry are surely not so antagonistic that we need wonder that that famous country which has given us Shakspeare and Byron should also produce a good musician. The old prejudice which believed it impossible has been already shaken by Field, Onslow, Potter, Bishop, and others; and now Sterndale Bennett has given it a harder blow than ever. Providence has watched over him from his cradle.....How far this development was promoted by the careful instruction he received at the Royal Academy of Music, in London, under masters like Crotch and Cipriani Potter, and by his own indefatigable studies, I know not; I only know that out of this chrysalis has burst a truly glorious butterfly, fluttering through the summer air, now lighting on this flower and now on that, and leaving us to follow with eager eyes and outstretched hands. A soaring spirit like this could not be contented to remain on its native earth without desiring to behold the land where its two greatest predecessors, Mozart and Beethoven, first saw the light. And thus it has come to pass that the favourite of the London public, and the pride of musical England, is residing with us."

No less as a performer than as a composer was Bennett welcomed in Germany. His principal works were given under Mendelssohn's direction—a compliment as flattering as it was deserved—at the famous Gewandhaus Concerts, and a sympathy sprang up in the Saxon capital for the English composer, which so long endured that years afterwards he was invited to assume the direction of the very concerts which had been his portal to the road of continental fame. But we are anticipating. Bennett was accompanied on his travels by a friend—one who, if he willed, might have earned a distinguished place upon the scroll of musical fame, but who preferred to judge rather than be judged—whose early affection continued undiminished during the composer's earthly career. Many pleasant anecdotes are related of those halcyon days; one, of Mendelssohn knocking at the door of the room where our countrymen were reposing at the hour of eight in the morning, and calling them "lazy Englishmen."

Returning from Germany honour-laden, Bennett set to work in earnest, composing, teaching, and performing with the most triumphant success. One of the notable events, following on his return from abroad, was the production of the overture to The Wood Nymphs—which had been written and played at Leipsic—by the Philharmonic Society. Success, which may legitimately be called triumphant, attended the performance. And now honours began to crowd thick and frequent upon him. In 1844 he became a candidate for the Musical Chair in the Edinburgh University, when his claims were warmly supported by testimony from Mendelssohn. Although the candidature was not successful, the facts attending it served to thrust Bennett prominently forward, and perhaps proved eventually more beneficial than though he had been elected to the post. Beloved of the nation and lauded by such musicians and critics as Schumann, Mendelssohn, &c., Bennett could well afford to wait, and, pursuing his ordinary avocations, teaching a great deal and producing occasional works—works which, by-the-bye, never were trifling or unimportant—he waited for more than a decade, when, in 1856, he was appointed Professor of Music to the University of Cambridge. The same season saw him installed as director of the Philharmonic Concerts, where he succeeded Richard Wagner. With unvarying success Professor Bennett held this position until 1868, when he resigned in favour of Mr W. G. Cusins. In addition to what he did for the society as conductor, Bennett enriched its repertory most signally; to wit, by the overture to Paradise and the Peri, one of the greatest masterpieces of programme music, and the symphony in G minor—his only published symphony—lately referred to in our columns. In 1858 he was invited to preside over the festival at Leeds, and for this meeting he composed his pastoral cantata, The May Queen, which has since become popular throughout the length and breadth of the land. At the same meeting Arabella Goddard played his well-known caprice in E major—one of his most finished masterpieces. In fact, we may say that this was a culminating point in his career as a creative musician, for, though his subsequent works were replete with the beauty and fascination which appertained to all emanations from his genius, the effect—the perfect propriety and dramatic fitness—of The May Queen were never transcended. In 1862 we find English music represented in his name at the opening of the International Exhibition by an ode, "Uplift a thousand voices," for which the Laureate furnished the text; in the same year he also composed the Ode in Commemoration of the Installation of the Duke of Devonshire as Chancellor of the University of Cambridge, the lyrics being in this instance provided by the late Canon Kingsley.

For the Birmingham Festival of 1867, Bennett composed his sacred cantata, The Woman of Samaria. All who are acquainted with this musician's method of procedure, his laborious care, and his unswerving anxiety to do his best, will accept the fact that the component parts of the sacred cantata are all gems. Bennett had still further honours in store for him. Oxford made him D.C.L. in 1870, and on the 24th of March, 1871, her Majesty the Queen conferred the honour of knighthood upon him, in conjunction with Mr Benedict, an illustrious foreigner, who had long before made England his home and English sympathies his own. A year later, Sir Sterndale Bennett received a public address from the Solicitor-General, announcing the institution of a biennial scholarship under his name. Here his public career may be considered to have ended; but his work, not yet finished, closed in a befitting manner with his pianoforte sonata, The Maid of Orleans, a piece destined for the fairy fingers of Arabella Goddard, and therefore a votive offering from England's leading composer to her leading executant. No more beautiful composition is to be found in the repertory of the instrument for which it was written, no emanation from a soul intensely poetical more instinct with melody and grace of expression.

The list of Bennett's published works contains but forty-six numbers, and hence the productivity of the musician who early promised abundant fruitfulness must be regarded as small. There were many reasons why he confined his efforts to occasional productions, the first and greatest of which was his natural modesty. If report speaks truly, the number of works which remain in manuscript, hoarded by their author as a miser hoards his gold, is in excess of those which have been given to the world. Another cause for this unusual reticence was the labour which Bennett used to spend over his compositions, altering this, correcting that, and seldom easily satisfied. He was not troubled with the cacoethes scribendi, and a hasty production never came from his pen; all was planned and thought out before committing to paper, and those revisions subsequently made were dictated by his innate sense of proportion and love of symmetry. All his published works are treasures; and, as we estimate art at the present time, perfect examples of their individual school. The day may arrive when the canons of art will be reversed, and in that unhappy time, Sterndale Bennett, like Mendelssohn, will be no more loved or revered. But while we continue to understand that the fundamental principle of art is to give the most harmonious expression to our ideas, we shall not fail to behold in the productions of "our English Mendelssohn" models of form, refinement, culture, and scholarship. Sterndale Bennett has left us in the flesh, but his works remain, a monumental testimony to his genius.

(From the "Pall Mall Gazette.")

The greatest composer England has ever produced was already so well and so widely known as "Sterndale Bennett" that in Germany, Holland, and all the countries inhabited by our Teutonic relatives, he will doubtless still continue to be known as "Sterndale Bennett," without the prefix either of "Professor," of "Doctor," or of "Sir." It was an excellent idea all the same to knight him, if only to prevent his being called "Doctor" and "Professor" in his own country. To understand at once the absurdity of academic titles in connection with artists of creative genius, it is only necessary to think of Rossini as "Dr Rossini," or Mozart as "Professor Mozart."* The Emperor Nicholas is said to have thought himself insulted when the University of Oxford made him a Doctor of Civil Laws; but that may have been because in his own empire he considered himself above laws. Mendelssohn, however, might with reason have felt himself aggrieved when the degree of Doctor in Philosophy was imposed upon him; though he, doubtless, took the well-meant compliment as it was intended. The qualities which raise a composer above other composers, and give him a hold on the mind and feelings of those who hear his music, are just such as a board of examiners cannot measure—sometimes cannot appreciate; and so many admirable masters have not been "doctors," while so many doctors of music have abstained from showing that their invention was at all on a par with their implied learning, that a composer, in the high artistic sense of the word, had much better not call himself "doctor," whether he has a right to do so or not.

Although Sterndale Bennett produced far less during the latter than during the earlier period of his career, he was always planning, carrying out, or perfecting some work. His last symphony (in G minor), than which he has written nothing finer in the way of orchestral music, dates from 1864. But he added a new movement to it (the graceful and melodious "Romanza,") years afterwards. Just a fortnight ago this thoroughly beautiful work was played at the Crystal Palace Concerts; and many who had listened to it with delight looked about to see whether the composer was present to hear their applause. But though he went over his manuscripts again and again before he would suffer them to leave him, Sterndale Bennett did not trouble himself about the fate of his music when he had once fairly given it to the public, and probably among those who heard a piece of his for the first time, the only person not quite content with the new creation was Bennett himself.

The latest work of the lamented composer is the sonata, now picturesque, now pathetic, in one movement religious, in another heroic, called Joan of Arc, composed for Madame Arabella Goddard, first played in public by Herr von Bülow. Sterndale Bennett will probably be best remembered in the concert-room by his orchestral works and his works for orchestra and piano; in the drawing-room by his minor pianoforte pieces, such as one of the oldest and at the same time one of the freshest of them all, entitled "The Lake, the Millstream, and the Fountain" (dedicated to J. W. Davison). "Mendelssohn," wrote Schumann, "spreads before us the lumbering ocean in all its boundless expanse; the other lingers by the softly rippling lake, with the moonbeam quivering on its surface."

These words occur in an article devoted to Sterndale Bennett in Schumann's musical journal. Bennett, then in his twenty-second year, had just arrived in Germany, taking with him the overture to the Naiads, which still passes for one of his finest works. That was nearly forty years ago; and in the meantime, though he wrote a great deal, he produced far less than might have been expected of him, had he devoted himself exclusively to composition. Several questions of deep and almost painful interest present themselves in connection with Sterndale Bennett's career which no one, perhaps, but himself could have answered. But as to his giving to the world comparatively few works, it should be remembered, first of all, that everything he did put forth was highly elaborated, full of delicate touches, and perfectly finished. It has taken Mr Kinglake ten years to write an account of the battle of Inkermann, though more than one journalist was able to describe it from beginning to end the very night on which it was fought. But the only point to consider in the matter is the value of Mr Kinglake's narrative now that we are at last fortunate enough to get it; and all that need be asked in connection with Sir Sterndale Bennett's works is whether each of them is not indeed a masterpiece. At the Royal Academy of Music he was precisely in his proper place. But it is impossible not to grudge him the long hours that he spent day after day and year after year in teaching young ladies to play the piano. A certain amount of teaching was perhaps inevitable; for, unhappily, a composer cannot live by sonatas, symphonies, and concertos alone. Dramatic works, such as the never-to-be-forgotten May Queen, might have proved more remunerative. But in the May Queen, the verse to which the music is "married" is "immortal" only from its badness. One of the most perfect of musical pieces begins with this line—"Can that eye a cottage hide?" The plot is worthy of the poem, which is either unintelligible or puerile. Considered only as music, the May Queen, with its succession of beautiful melodies and simple but ingenious harmonies, is all that could be desired. But it has the disadvantage of being bound indissolubly to words with which it ought never to have been connected.

Apparently, Sterndale Bennett was not very particular as to the "words" he adopted from time to time for musical setting. Yet he showed a certain inclination for "programme music;" and he was fond of giving distinct names to his pieces, instead of merely numbering them and letting them be known as No. so-and-so, in such a key. In each of these tendencies we see at least the indication of a dramatic taste. Sterndale Bennett has not, as far as we know, left on record any direct expression of opinion as to the music, still less to the musical theories, of his contemporaries. But he had evident affinities with Mendelssohn. He inspired Schumann with much sympathy; and the composer of so many melodious, beautifully modelled, and delicately finished works could not have been favourably impressed by Wagner, who, considering how unable he has shown himself to estimate the genius of Mendelssohn at anything like its true value, would certainly have depreciated Bennett if he had ever condescended to speak of him. Bennett's friends and allies were Mendelssohn, Schumann, and Ferdinand Hiller; and to them in the secondary degree—though to his own admirable works in the first place—he owed the high position which he quickly attained in Germany, where, among musicians and the best class of amateurs, he is as well known as in England. The English Sterndale Bennett and the Danish Niels Gade are, perhaps, looked upon by the Germans as distinguished citizens of the same musical country as themselves. That seemed to be the light in which both Bennett and Gade were regarded when, five years ago, the two were present together at the Bonn Festival in honour of Beethoven. The French used to say that no singer could be considered successful who had not sung with success at Paris. It is certain that no composer of instrumental music can be said to have made his mark until he has been heard and adopted in Germany. In that sense not only Sterndale Bennett but also Macfarren have achieved success. Sterndale Bennett, however, has penetrated into German houses—an advantage no composer can well obtain who does not write specially for the voice, or the pianoforte.

It can scarcely be said that Sterndale Bennett was not honoured in his own country. But had he lived in Germany (it was not necessary that he should have been born there) he would have been appreciated, not more highly perhaps, but much more widely, than he is at this moment in England. There are more private players in Germany than in England equal to the difficulties of his pianoforte music, which, if it is not to be played perfectly, had better be left alone; and more concerts are given there than here in which his sonatas, his concertos, and his symphonies would naturally find a place. In England during Bennett's earlier years, and indeed until quite lately, a hard and fast line was drawn between subscription concerts of classical music, which the general public regard with a sort of awe, as something between mathematics and metaphysics, and concerts made up of show fantasias, songs of various kinds, and operatic scenas. Concerts composed of good and varied music, such as may now be heard on Saturdays at the Crystal Palace, were not offered to the general public at all; and of the tens of thousands who attended the performances of Balfe's operas, there were few, if any, who had ever heard, or meant to hear, so much as a passage by Sterndale Bennett. We have now three times as many concert-rooms as we had then; and, counting those alone that are given at St James's Hall, the Crystal Palace, and the Albert Hall, at least six or eight times as many concerts. Thus it has happened that, while Sterndale Bennett has produced less every year, his compositions, taking them as a whole, have found every year a greater number of admirers. Nor can the circle fail to extend more and more as the taste increases for beautiful music. This Bennett's music emphatically is—differing in that respect from much so-called "good music," which, however "good" in a technical sense, is perhaps in a poetical sense just the contrary. A very large number of Englishmen who frequent theatres, the Opera, and even concerts, have not the least idea of the charm which pervades everything Bennett has written. He is undoubtedly one of the classical composers, not of England alone, but of the whole world. There is, however, nothing in the perfectly spontaneous flow of his ideas to suggest mere school or barren study; and a simple-minded lover of music might listen to no matter which of his graceful and melodious pieces without knowing it to be "classical" at all. The works of some few of the great composers must, to the ignorant, always be sealed books. But every one who can be moved by sweet sounds must enjoy the music of Sterndale Bennett.

(From the "Morning Advertiser.")

In Sir Sterndale Bennett we have lost a representative man. Rivalry may exist in the musical as in all other professions, but English composers of every grade united in accepting him as their chief. They reverenced him for what he had written, and gave place to him as the man who in his generation had done more than any other to sustain the dignity of art and the credit of the native school. Sterndale Bennett was an artist in all his sympathies. He strove always to uphold the true and beautiful in music, and disdained to pander to the vulgar taste. He never wrote a "shop song" in his life, nor made his art subservient to unworthy conditions of any kind. The bent of his genius led him into the higher realms of music, and, fortunately for posterity, kept him there. While the appreciation of purity in music exists, the name of Sterndale Bennett will be held in veneration. He was endowed with something more than the talent which will haply make a man prosperous and respected in his lifetime. The musician gone to his rest had genius which gives the immortality of art, and is for all time. Sterndale Bennett has gone from us; but before he was taken hence he was allowed to point out the way, which, if followed by his younger brethren in art, might lead them to fame that lasts beyond this life. Many young composers will look to his works and study his scores, and see how little, after all, they themselves have been able to do for music; and many a man who has numbered more years than the dead musician will hear the inner voices whispering to him how far he has fallen short of the standard of art set up by Sterndale Bennett. Art has its degrees; and even a greater man than Sterndale Bennett illustrated the exquisite story played out in the "wood near Athens;" but Mendelssohn was his friend, and mainly instrumental in bringing his compositions before the world. Sterndale Bennett's course is run, but his exquisite compositions remain. With the poignant regrets for the death of the musician will be intermixed many precious memories of the kind, gentle, and affectionate nature of the man.

"Wilt thou have music? Hark! Apollo plays."
—Taming of the Shrew.

Sterndale Bennett, the man who has done more for the cause of English music than any other since Purcell, was laid at rest in Westminster Abbey on Saturday afternoon. In him the nation loses one of her most gifted sons, and the world of music one of its brightest stars. Still, though the blow be sudden, and the sorrow grievous, we may not complain. Sterndale Bennett had finished a career as honourable as it had been distinguished, when he completed his last published work, the pianoforte sonata, Die Jungfrau von Orleans, dedicated, with an apt discrimination, to Madame Arabella Goddard. His life had been a sequence of triumphs, social and artistic; and, when the highest honours he could possibly gain were fairly in his grasp, the master ceased his work, and rested. That rest, as far as the mortal garb in which his immortal spirit dwelt is concerned, is an eternal one; but neither his name nor fame are lost; and, while pure music has force to ennoble our fancies and expand our intellects, Sterndale Bennett, in his works, will be a living, moving power in our midst. At the age of fifty-nine Bennett was called away; and so it happens that "the English Mendelssohn" reposes within a few feet of the grave wherein "the English Handel"—Purcell—sleeps his last sleep. Nothing could exceed the deferential homage paid to Bennett's memory. His burial in Westminster Abbey—the presence at the funeral of all the men of note who have made their livelong efforts tend to the same goal as his own—the generous determination of the leading corporate musical societies to render the obsequies a national matter—these facts speak not alone to the estimation in which Bennett was held, but to the worldly position which he enjoyed. Fitting tribute to the departed genius was forthcoming, and he was carried to the grave in a manner worthy of one whose life had been throughout attended with honours. Bennett wrote comparatively little, his published works numbering but forty-six; but every work that he permitted to go forth to the world was perfect of its kind. In face of the manner in which his compositions have been catalogued in our contemporaries, the barest reference to them is enough:—The overtures to Parasina, The Naiades, The Wood Nymphs, and Paradise and the Peri, his Pianoforte Concerto in F minor (No. 4), his beautiful Symphony in G minor, and last, but by no means least, his Pianoforte Sonata, Die Jungfrau von Orleans, are so familiar, that praise at the present moment would be supererogatory. Many utterances have been made under the first influences of a heavy grief which will scarcely bear subsequent and dispassionate consideration. But while music survives, and the rules which govern this most beautiful art continue, England will be able to point to Sterndale Bennett as one who upheld her name as a musical country, not only at home, but throughout the whole civilized world. For the present we will not turn the occasion to profit, and write uncalled-for panegyrics upon his honoured name, but—

"Make dust our paper, and with rainy eyes
Write sorrow on the bosom of the earth."

ARION.

A TRIBUTE TO SIR WILLIAM STERNDALE BENNETT.

What can we say of him who now has gone?
Or how describe the beauty of that mind
Which now lies cold and mute? What can we say
Of one whose strains have waken'd in our hearts
A brighter, better, holier feeling?
If we but say he lov'd his Art for Art
Itself, and not for honours or reward;
Or that his title lent no lustre to
His name, which he did not repay
A hundred-fold; how little have we said
To mark the worth of him who hath endear'd
Himself alike by virtue as by genius.—
Language fails. Art itself doth mourn the loss
Of her bright champion, whose spirit now
Has fled to swell that harmony divine
Which gave birth to his own.
We have done well to let him sleep among
The sculptur'd and escutcheon'd of the land.
(No nobler dust sleeps there.) And, while the love
Of all that's beautiful exists, his name
Will be remembered, and his music live,
For ages yet to come, to soothe and bless
And elevate mankind.

SIR STERNDALE BENNETT.

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

SIR,—As the absence of my name from the list of professional musicians who attended the funeral of the late Sir W. Sterndale Bennett may lead to the supposition that I am unmindful of the respect due to his memory, I beg you will give publicity to the following letters. Permit me also to say in reference to Mr Lamborn Cock's letter, that the "Card of admission" alluded to, and which, it appears, ought to have been forwarded to me from the Royal Academy of Music, has not reached me. Also, that without waiting for Mr Lamborn Cock's reply to my letter, I did that for which I had asked permission. One of Mr Cock's own cards, giving me admission to the Abbey, was enclosed in his letter, but, unfortunately, it came too late to be available.

I shall always deeply regret that, through what I trust may prove unintentional neglect on the part of the Royal Academy of Music, I was prevented joining in a public acknowledgment of the many virtues and talents of England's most distinguished musician. I have the honour to be, Sir, your obedient servant,

H. WYLDE
(Gresham Professor).

Gresham College, Feb. 10, 1875.

"Gresham College, Feb. 5, 1875.

"DEAR SIR,—As the committee entrusted with the funeral honours to be paid to the late Sir W. Sterndale Bennett have not accorded me the privilege of personally paying my tribute of respect, nor, as Gresham Professor, of showing how highly his name was esteemed in this college, I trust I may be permitted to send my carriage to-morrow to follow the funeral cortege, and I beg you will acquaint me with the hour of its departure. I was always on the most friendly terms with Sir W. Sterndale Bennett, although my association with the London Academy separated us more than I desired, and I have a keen appreciation of his kind and generous nature, as well as great admiration of his genius and talents. You must excuse me, therefore, in saying that I had hoped all the acts of the committee would have reflected the noble-mindedness of our departed great musician, and that no 'professional differences' would have been remembered on such a solemn and melancholy occasion.—I am, dear Sir, yours faithfully,

"H. WYLDE.

"68, New Bond Street, Feb. 6, 1875, 9 a.m.

"DEAR SIR,—I quite understood that an admission was posted to you yesterday—I will enquire about it from the secretaries, Mr S. Lucas and Mr Gill. I am on the point of leaving for the residence of Sir Sterndale Bennett, being one of the mourners from the house, or I would stay to attend to it. I may say, on behalf of the committee and the family, they will esteem it highly your kindly sending your carriage. Be so good as to let it be in Tenderden Street not later than 10.30. Excuse great haste.—Yours very truly,

"J. L. COCK.

STERNDALE BENNETT.

Sleep, Sterndale Bennett, thou art gone to thy rest!
Of English musicians the greatest and best.
The hand that discoursed at thy magical will
Such eloquent music is silent and still.
Thou art gone to thy bride who has waited so long—
The wife whom thou lovedst with a love so strong.
But, ah! the deep grief will ne'er have an end,
In those who could boast the title of friend.

Mourn, England, mourn! for set is the star
That carried thy name in honour afar:
The land that for music now stands first in fame
Acknowledged thy genius and honoured thy name.
In nations that speak the old English tongue,
By thousands thy beautiful May Queen is sung.
Tho' fame and tho' honours were showered on thee,
From pride and ambition thy pure mind was free.
Farewell, Sterndale Bennett! thou hast run thy brief span,
Farewell, great musician! farewell, blameless man!
In the grand old Abbey they have pillowed his head,
And calmly he sleeps midst the mighty dead,—
With Handel, and Purcell, and Gibbons he lies,
'Till the trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall arise.

Ryde, Feb. 6, 1875. W. C. M.

STUTTGART.—After leaving the Conservatory of Music, Professor Spiedel has established a Pianoforte School for professional and private students. Herr Seifriz, Royal Capellmeister, has accepted the chair of composition, while Herren Hugo Wehrle, and Jul. Cabisius, will give lessons in concerted playing.

MUSIC AT BIRMINGHAM.

(From our own Correspondent.)

Christmas festivities over, and the first keen edge of pantomime appetite taken off, music has resumed her sway, three concerts of more or less interest having recently been given. First in point of order as well as novelty was that of Messrs Harrison, introducing Dr Hans von Bülow to a Birmingham audience. Much curiosity was naturally excited to hear the pianist about whose playing such contradictory opinions had been promulgated, consequently the Masonic Hall (an excellent room for chamber music) was well filled, despite the high prices, half-a-crown being the lowest scale of admission. The programme, played entirely from memory, was certainly calculated to give an idea of Dr Bülow's varied powers. That Dr Bülow possesses very undoubted mastery over the key-board, and, indeed, every requisite for a great player, no one can deny. In a selection of four pieces by Chopin, anything more deliciously delicate or exquisitely refined than his playing it would be impossible to conceive, while in the rhapsodies set down under the name of Liszt the pianist again appeared to find congenial occupation.

Mr Stockley's second orchestral concert was characterized by a good selection, comprising three overtures, each a masterpiece in its way—Beethoven's Egmont, Mendelssohn's Hebrides, and Auber's Masaniello—Mozart's symphony in C, the entr'acte preceding the second act of Ambroise Thomas's Mignon, and Ferdinand Hiller's concerto for piano and orchestra (Op. 69) in F sharp minor, in which Mdlle le Brun distinguished herself as a pianist of excellent capacity and greater promise, qualities further exhibited in Thalberg's Don Giovanni fantasia, which, being encored, was replaced by the same composer's "Home, sweet home." The vocalists were Miss Frances Brooke, whose voice, a mezzo soprano, was hardly suited to some of the music set down for her, and Mr Vernon Rigby, who gives a contradiction to the adage that "a prophet has no honour in his own country," by always meeting with a reception at the hands of his fellow-townsmen as thoroughly cordial as it is well deserved. It has frequently fallen to my lot to censure the orchestral playing in Birmingham, but I am glad to be able to record that upon this occasion a marked improvement was noticeable, although very much more remains to be done ere the local native talent attains that certainty of attack, delicacy, precision, and attention to light and shade so necessary for a perfect performance.

At the next orchestral concert, as a mark of respect to the memory of the lamented Sir Sterndale Bennett—whose Woman of Samaria conferred upon Birmingham a like honour to that of Mendelssohn with Elijah—the Wood Nymphs and Naiads overtures will be given. One of the pianoforte concertos of the great master whose loss we all deplore would also have been included, but that the arrangements for the programme had gone too far to admit of such alteration.

For their third concert, Messrs Harrison (the enterprising impressarii of the Black Country) engaged Mr Mapleson's touring party, including Mdlle Tietjens, Mdlle Risarelli, Mdme Trebelli-Bettini, Signori Paladini, Catalani, and Perkins, with M. Colyns, a Belgian violinist, and Mr F. H. Cowen, solo pianoforte and conductor. The Town Hall was crammed, despite the terribly wet weather. It was satisfactory to find that, although still suffering from physical weakness, Mdlle Tietjens' voice showed no trace of her recent severe illness; while Mdme Trebelli, as well as the great German songstress, met with that hearty and enthusiastic reception which Birmingham so well knows how to accord to its special favourites. The same party is announced to appear for a sacred concert on Ash Wednesday, when Rossini's Stabat Mater and a selection from the same master's Messe Solennelle (not a note of which has yet been heard in Birmingham) will be given.

D. H.

PESTH.—Liszt was to arrive on the 10th, and Herr R. Wagner, with his wife, on the 19th inst., for the purpose of giving concerts here and in Vienna.

LUBECK.—A new three-act opera, Aennchen von Tharau, will be produced at the Stadttheater, for the first time, before the expiration of the current month. The book is by Dr Julius Stinde and the music by Herr Ernst Catenhausen, formerly Capellmeister at Cologne.

MUSIC IN GLASGOW.

(From our own Correspondent.)

Glasgow, in musical matters, has of late been very busy. I would have written you sooner regarding these but for reasons which need not now be entered into, I thought it advisable not to do so. The great scheme of the season, a desire to establish a "resident orchestra" in Glasgow, has not met with that measure of success which its ardent supporters had anticipated. It is reported that a considerable shortcoming in the funds will have to be made up by the guarantors, who subscribed a sum reaching nearly £4,000. This result is to be deplored, seeing that the orchestra is one of rare excellence, containing as it does the following amongst other distinguished executants: Mr Carrodus, as leader, is supported by Mr H. C. Cooper, Mr Gibson, &c.; Mr Peyton heads the second violins; Mr Hann, the violas; Mr Edward Howell, the violoncellos; and Mr A. Howell, the double basses. In the winds are found the well-known names of Mr Keppell, M. Lavigne, Mr Tyler, and Mr Hutchings. The brasses include the Messrs Harpers, Ellis, Tull, Harvey, and Signor Barra. The selection of music for these concerts has been uniformly characterized by rare good taste and enterprise, and it is no exaggeration to say that at no series of orchestral concerts has a finer or more elevated class of music been presented. Nor should I omit to make special mention of the annotated and illustrated programmes. I have seen nothing to excel them; not even those of the Crystal Palace Classical Concerts. To the writings of Mr Grove, late of Sydenham, and Mr Joseph Bennett, of London, the programme committee are much indebted. It is impossible, in a brief letter like this, to enumerate all the works performed; foremost among them may be noted three of Beethoven's symphonies (C minor, Pastoral, and Eroica); Mendelssohn's Scotch and Italian symphonies; Schumann's, in B flat; Schubert's unfinished symphony in B minor; Mozart's Jupiter and C minor; and part of one by Spohr. Three choral and orchestral concerts have been given. At the first one, Smart's Jacob (originally produced at the Glasgow Festival of 1873) was the chief item; the programme of the same evening included Brahms' "Song of Destiny." The second choral concert was occupied entirely with Macfarren's St John the Baptist. At the third, the Messiah was given.

One of the most prominent features of the series has been the appearance of Mr Lambeth's "select choir." This small body of artists (numbering only twenty-four voices) has been trained by their conductor to a high state of perfection. Indeed, I have heard no such singing of madrigals and part-songs since the best days of Mr Henry Leslie's choir. Their efforts have been thoroughly appreciated, and, whenever they sang, enthusiastic applause has followed. Not less attractive has been the solo playing of Mr Carrodus, a countryman of whom we all feel proud. This gentleman's performances have been welcomed with an ardour which is not often experienced so far north. During the season, Mr Carrodus played (besides other items) the last two movements of Beethoven's violin Concerto, and the whole of Mendelssohn's. Mr Carrodus has now become such a universal favourite in Glasgow that no future orchestral concerts will be considered right without him. This favourable opinion I most willingly endorse. The violoncello playing of Mr Edward Howell has also formed a conspicuous attraction. He has given several solos, and your readers need not be informed with what excellence they were played. Mr A. Howell (double bass) has also covered himself with honour, especially for the important part he played in one of Handel's trios for violin (Mr Carrodus), violoncello (Mr E. Howell), and double bass. Some of the other members of the orchestra have contributed solos; amongst them Mr Keppel (flute), M. Lavigne (oboe), Mr Tyler (clarinet), and Mr Harvey (trombone).

DRESDEN.—A concert of especial local interest was lately given here, the programme, a tolerably long one, containing only works by living Dresden composers. The compositions selected were Overtures by Jul. Rietz, F. Baumfelder, C. Krebs, Riccius, and Bertholdt; Symphonic Marches by Gust. Franke and Kretschmer; B flat minor Symphony by Ernst Jul. Otto; a Romance for bass trombone by Grützmacher; a Scherzo by F. Reichel; a "Characterstück" by Rischbieter; and Fritz Spindler's "Husarenritt," transcribed for orchestra.

BRIGHTON MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

(From the "Daily Telegraph," Feb. 10.)

The musical festival with which Mr Kuhe has again endowed Brighton began on Tuesday evening in the Pavilion Dome, with every prospect of success. It would be strange as well as hard were the case otherwise. Mr Kuhe not only deserves a return for so much public spirit, but has gone a long way to conquer it by persisting year after year in making his claims known and understood. The English public are slow to acknowledge new interests, but, having once done so, they are slow to neglect them. For this reason Mr Kuhe's Festival may now be looked upon as safe. The amateurs of the southern counties regard it as an institution to support which is to do the correct thing. And, if report be true, they mean this time to make the Festival a greater success than ever. That the liberal arrangements of the London, Brighton, and South Coast Railway will facilitate the end in view is beyond question. Never before has a commercial company acted in such a kindly spirit towards an artistic enterprise, or with so much shrewd appreciation of what seems to its advantage and good name. Doubtless, the towns within easy reach of Brighton will contribute largely to the success of the Festival, which thus appeals to a wider constituency than ever.

This evening's programme was intended chiefly to display the resources of an orchestra adequate in point of numbers, made up of artists individually competent, and led by the ablest of chefs d'attaque, M. Sainton. When it is stated that among the performers engaged, in addition to the eminent gentleman just named, are Messrs Viotti Collins, Howell, Radcliffe, Barrett, Lazarus, Reynolds, Hughes, and Lockwood, it will be taken for granted that the orchestra is thoroughly up to the mark. True, the opening performance this evening was not free from blemish; but some shortcomings might have been expected at the outset; and could only have surprised the unreasonable. The programme had been skilfully drawn up, so as to present varied attractions, and the result was a large and brilliant audience promising well for the Festival alike as regards numbers and enthusiasm. In the first part were mostly classical works, beginning with the overture to Fidelio, fourth and last of the marvellous preludes written by Beethoven for his single opera. This was conducted by Mr F. Kingsbury, who has long shared with Mr Kuhe the conductor's duty, and done much to make the Festival an artistic success. Music so familiar could not go other than well, or be other than well received; but the audience were more demonstrative after hearing the pretty little gavotte, which is so attractive a feature in the Mignon of M. Ambroise Thomas. The delicacy and grace of this quaint dance were perfectly shown; indeed, the music could not have been better played, and an encore was the natural result. Next came the Concertstück of Weber, in connection with which ever-welcome piece Mr Kuhe made his bow as a pianist. The "proprietor" of the Festival was received after a fashion adequate to his claims, long-continued applause demonstrating that some, at least, of those for whom he caters so spiritedly are not ungrateful. How Mr Kuhe played the brilliant music of Weber need not be told. He never was in better form, nor within our experience has he ever achieved a more genuine success with his audience. Enthusiastic applause and a recall followed the close of the work. The time had now come for the vocal music, which at orchestral concerts so many hail with delight, and Miss Edith Wynne was introduced to sing the air, "Dalla torre sua romita," from Gounod's Sappho. Written in the French composer's most characteristic style, that is to say, marked strongly by his mannerisms, this air could not fail to delight many to whom M. Gounod's music is ever welcome, especially as Miss Wynne sang it with all the artistic perception and vocal skill which belong to her in an eminent degree. It may be questioned, however, whether a better choice was not possible without going far afield, or even without searching beyond the works of M. Gounod himself. Following the song came what was described in the programme as "Andante and Finale from Concerto, Mendelssohn," but which turned out to be the whole of the masterpiece named. By whomsoever the change was effected, the maker deserved great credit. Such a classical chef d'œuvre as Mendelssohn's Concerto should be given in its entirety, or not at all—the more because it is not made up of independent movements, connected only by a common name, but so fashioned that each movement is linked closely to the others. Besides, when such an artist as M. Sainton plays, we desire that his great powers should have the full exposition which only a complete work like the one in question makes possible. The result was in all respects satisfactory. M. Sainton played with a verve, refinement, and accuracy worthy the ablest living representative of the great French school; all the strong individuality which enables him to do some things as no other man can being exhibited to perfection. Frequently applauded in the course of the work, M. Sainton, at its close, was recalled by acclamation, and congratulated upon his success in the warmest manner. At this point, Mr Kingsbury, who had conducted throughout with much intelligence, handed over the baton to Mr Kuhe, and the first part was brought to a close by a performance of Haydn's symphony in C major, first of the twelve composed for Salomon's concerts. Mr Kuhe did wisely to introduce this pleasant masterpiece, and it may be accepted as an axiom on all such occasions that if it be desired to enlist the sympathies of the general public for classical music, there is no course so sure as the presentation of Haydn. The old master can charm philosopher and fool alike; for while one dwells with pleasure upon his consummate art, the other revels in a flood of artless tune. This was well exemplified by the performance under notice. Everybody heard the symphony with interest, and the loudest applause came from those parts of the house where one might perhaps have looked for the feeblest. Following the symphony, by way of tribute to the memory of the late Sir Sterndale Bennett, came Chopin's funeral march, after the first notes of which the entire audience rose, and remained standing to the end. The act was gracefully done, and obviously had the entire concurrence of all present. With regard to the march itself, it may be urged that so impressive a composition, so singular in character and so thoroughly in keeping with Chopin's genius, should have more frequent use. It deserves adoption as one of our recognised expressions of musical grief.

The second part was more popular in character than the first, and began with a selection from Meyerbeer's Etoile du Nord, introducing solos from Messrs Sainton, Radcliffe, Barrett, Lazarus, Reynolds, and Hughes, all of which, capitally played, were much to the taste of the audience. Miss Wynne sang Sullivan's "Living Poems" and Oakley's "Tears, idle tears," the remainder of the selection comprising Schubert's "Ave Maria," for cornet solo (Mr Reynolds), and the overture to Les Diamans de la Couronne. With Auber's bright music, ended a very successful and interesting concert. Bach's Passion Music will be given on Thursday evening; and for Friday morning a classical miscellaneous programme is announced. The week's work closes on Saturday, with Sir M. Costa's Naaman, conducted by the composer.

Times for Music.

A SUMMER NIGHT.

List to the sigh of the waves to-night—
The voice of the restless sea,
As it heaves 'neath a veil of silvery light,
That bathes the ocean and lea.
List to the trill of the nightingale,
As she sings to the glittering skies,
While far away an answering hale
Like a trembling echo dies.

List to the wind through the rustling trees,
Laden with breath of flowers;
Heavy and odorous comes the breeze,
As the dew falls in diamond showers.
Everything looks so peaceful and still,
Under the pale moon's light;
And the world seems free from sorrow and ill
On this glorious summer night.

LONDON, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 13, 1875.

THE ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC TO THE CHILDREN OF STERNDALE BENNETT.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC,
4, TENTERDEN STREET, HANOVER SQUARE,
LONDON, February 4th, 1875.

DEAR SIRS AND MADAME,—We, the Committee of Management of the Royal Academy of Music, beg to offer you the expression of our deep sympathy in your heavy affliction. The bereavement you have sustained is not yours alone; in Sir Sterndale Bennett we have lost a friend who owned more personal love than falls to the lot of most men. England has lost one of its brightest ornaments; and music has lost an influence that has aided very materially in its advancement. It will be some consolation to us to remember that we have worked with the great musician we lament, and under his presidency in the management of this institution, wherein his genius was trained, and that had of late his peculiar care and affection.

The name Sterndale Bennett will still be conspicuous among those of which his country is proudest, and music is for ever enriched by his works, while native musicians will always be stimulated by his example.

When the pain of the present moment may be assuaged by time, let us hope that the heir-loom of your father's name may be as great a comfort to you as it will certainly be a distinction in the estimate of all the world, and that your pride may constantly be renewed in knowing yourselves the children of William Sterndale Bennett.

We are, with sincere regard, your devoted servants,

BRINLEY RICHARDS,	W. F. LOW,
GEO. WOOD,	MANUEL GARCIA,
CHARLES STEGGALL, Mus. D.,	W. DORRELL,
FRANK R. COX,	HENRY C. LUNN,
WALTER MACFARREN,	HENRY LESLIE,
	LAMBORN COCK, Treasurer,
Charles and James Bennett, Esqs., and Mrs T. Case.	G. A. MACFARREN, Chairman.

SIR STERNDALE BENNETT was buried on Saturday afternoon, by permission of Dean Stanley, at Westminster Abbey, close to the graves of Purcell and Croft, two of his most illustrious predecessors in the sphere which he had elected for himself, and in which he moved with dignity through the course of his artistic life. No more need be added to what has already been written about the career and works of Sterndale Bennett. That musical England widely deplores his loss the imposing ceremony of Saturday afforded sufficient proof. From all ranks and walks of life there were representatives to do him honour. Among the private carriages that joined the funeral cortége were those of Her Majesty the Queen, a great admirer of Bennett's music; His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, His Royal Highness the Duke of Edinburgh, and the Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol. Earl Dudley (President of the Royal Academy of Music), who, with the Duke of Edinburgh, the Bishop of Gloucester, Sir Thomas Gladstone, and Lord Coleridge, were among the first to sign the requisition, suggested and drawn up by Mr G. A. Macfarren, to which Dean Stanley so heartily assented, was present on the occasion, and remained till the end of the service. Besides four mourning carriages occupied by the family and most intimate friends of the deceased, there were some 30 others, filled with persons of more or less note. Deputations were sent from the University of Cambridge—including the Vice-Chancellor, the Master of St John's, and the Precentor of King's College; from the Royal Society of Musicians of Great Britain; from the Royal Academy of Music; from the Philharmonic Society (directors, committee, and professors); and, last not least, from the Verein für Kunst und Wissenschaft (German Athenæum). Without entering into further particulars, we must be content to add that a full catalogue of those who came voluntarily to do honour to the memory of our distinguished countryman would take up more space than can be afforded. Enough that there was scarcely a carriage which did not contain mourners who, in their various capabilities, had done something to earn distinction. What, perhaps, more than anything else, afforded gratification to those who knew and appreciated the worth of Bennett, as an artist and as a man, was the immense crowd attracted to the Cathedral, unfurnished with the special privileges allotted only to occupants of the Choir. This all who had familiar acquaintance with the departed man of genius knew well would have pleased him more than anything else, being a proof that, uncompromising as he was in whatever concerned his art, his name had still spread far and wide, and that his music had penetrated not only into high places, but into every circle where such honest, genuine work as his could be felt and loved.

It would be of little purpose to describe the service in detail. A word or two must suffice. The ceremony was in all respects impressive. The imperishable music of Croft, Purcell (including the "Burial Chant"), and Handel—a selection from whose "Funeral Anthem" ("His body is buried in peace")—was sung over the grave, immediately before the "Blessing," followed by the "Dead March," from the oratorio of Saul, sublime in its simplicity, imparted appropriate significance to the solemn and touching occasion. The choir was composed of twenty-eight boys—Westminster Abbey, St Paul's, the Temple, the Chapel Royal, and Lincoln's Inn—with twenty-six men from among the picked choristers belonging to the same churches, organised under the general direction of Mr Montem Smith. They sang uniformly well. But perhaps the deepest interest was created by the exquisite and purely devotional quartet, "God is a spirit," from Sir Sterndale Bennett's own Woman of Samaria. This, which followed the Lesson, was entrusted to Master Beckham (of Westminster), Messrs John Foster, George Carter, and John Lawler, (all likewise of Westminster). It could hardly have been better given; and, when the last verse was sung by the whole choir, the effect was such that it would have pleased the composer himself, although he never dreamed of such an innovation. Mr Turle, of Westminster Abbey, presided at the organ—his prescriptive right; but other organists were named in the official list; as, for example, Dr Stainer, Dr C. Steggall, Messrs George Cooper and E. J. Hopkins. The early part of the service was read by Canon Conway, the remainder (at the grave), by Dean Stanley himself. The body and mourners passed through the north transept to the grave, and were met by the clergy and choristers from the west gate of the Choir, under the organ. Then the music of Croft was resumed, followed by that of Handel, to which reference has been made. The coffin was strewed with wreaths and flowers, and when the chief mourners had taken their last farewell, the general public were equally allowed to do homage to the great musician whose hand is henceforth still and whose lyre is now for ever silent. Sterndale Bennett is dead; but his music, happily, survives him—long to delight the world.

In tribute to the memory of the late Sir W. Sterndale Bennett, the Orchestra will play Chopin's "Funeral March" to-night.

A GOOD SUGGESTION.

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

SIR,—I have for years cherished a hope that we might one day have a memorial window in Westminster Abbey to perpetuate the memory of the many distinguished musicians whose mortal remains are there enshrined; and now that our loved and departed friend, Sir Sterndale Bennett, is laid to rest with the kindred dust of Purcell, Croft, and Blow, it would seem to be a favourable opportunity for inaugurating a public subscription for the purpose I have indicated.

There is a colourless window overlooking the musicians' corner, which, with the permission of the Very Rev. the Dean of Westminster, might be filled with glass worthy of the sacred building and those memories all amateurs and artists would desire to honour. I am, yours, &c., WILLIAM H. CUMMINGS.

Brackley Villas, Thurlow Park Road, Dulwich, Feb. 8, 1875.

Too Late.

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

SIR,—At a time like the present, when musicians and amateurs are lamenting the loss of Sir W. Sterndale Bennett, a stronger desire than usual will naturally be kindled to become still more familiar with those immortal works of the great composer, which, like the season of the year and its peaceful circumstances so many of them poetically reflect, will be always fresh, green, and hopeful. The outside public are not so well acquainted as they should be with those charming songs, published in sets, so thoroughly appreciated by amateurs, and which are little pastoral gems. We may anticipate an eagerness on its part now to be introduced to some of these beautiful specimens, as the heart that conceived them, and the hand that penned them, are still for ever. Among them it would be difficult to find one to excel in genuine musical and poetic feeling a little jewel called "Forget-me-not"—a suggestive title. It is a setting of some words by "L. E. L." This song is very rarely sung in public, and for no other reason than that it is too short for public performance. It consists of but one short verse. Now, if another verse were added, in imitation somewhat of "L. E. L.'s" beautiful thoughts, the objection would be overcome, and I am sure my brother and sister artists would find great pleasure in introducing the song frequently. In default of one better capable of writing such a verse, acting upon the suggestion, I venture to offer some words; their only merit is of a negative character—they do not in their accent war against the musical accent. I first subjoin "L. E. L.'s" exquisite lines, that the imitative character of the offered verse may be apparent, and its consequent not unsuitableness may also be seen:—

FORGET-ME-NOT.

"Wave that wand'rest singing by,
Bearing leaves and flowers with thee,
To the lady of my heart
Wave a benison from me.

"Wind that rov'st around the grove,
Kissing ev'ry flower nigh,
I'll send thee on a sweeter search—
Bear my own true love my sigh.

"Bark that show'st my graven words,
Thine be yet a happier lot,
May'st thou meet my maiden's eye,
Bidding her 'Forget-me-not.'"

Fleecy cloudlets, fraught with good,
Sailing swift on Summer's eve,
Shower blessings on my love,
Or I ne'er shall cease to grieve.

Stars that shine through silent night,
Glitter round my maiden's cot;
Lovingly some message bring,
Light with hope my dismal lot.

Birds whose song perfumes the vale,
Leave, I pray, your hallowed spot;
Let your music teach my heart,
She I love forgets me not.

—I am, Sir, yours obediently,
February 6, 1875. F. E. PENNA.

Flocks and Herds.

TREATMENT OF ANIMALS.

(From "Another World.")

"Why are the poor hungry?—Why do not your flocks and herds multiply and increase?—Why do you maltreat the sire and kill the mother of many progenies?"

"Obey my laws, and your flocks will equal in number the drops of water in the great Cataract, which, ever flowing, ever merging in the mighty Ocean, is constantly supplied with new increase for the refreshment and delight of Montallnyah."

Amongst the numerous precautions for the promotion of the general health is the attention given to the subject of animal food, the care taken of the beast, the mode of slaughtering, and the rigour with which every beast having the slightest tendency to disease is rejected as unfit for food.

All animals, and particularly those intended for food, are now treated with great kindness, gentle treatment and cleanliness being thought essential to the excellence of the meat. Formerly, when the beasts were improperly treated, the growth of the young was impeded and the quality of the meat deteriorated. They are now watched over with the utmost care, the greatest attention is paid to the most minute particulars, and so well are they treated that, notwithstanding the heat of the climate, they are quite tame. When any one goes into a field, the sheep and lambs will come round him and lick his hand. Their pasture is changed every week, for it is found that, when in our climate grass is eaten too closely, noxious insects are bred by the accumulation of stale manure. In or near every pasturage are pools of running water, to which the animals are conducted daily. These are supplied by a very high jet which, when in action, throws its water from a reservoir to a long distance, which may even be increased by means of pipes, and thus fertilizes the field. Much of the water proceeds in the first instance from the cataracts, which begin high above the level of the meadows. As soon as the animals are turned out, the jet is made to play on the fields they have quitted. Then the moisture, mingling with the fresh manure, and our glorious sun enrich the land, and luxuriant grass is quickly produced.

In former years diseases prevailed amongst our flocks and herds. We had one amongst the sheep, not unlike the small-pox of your world. These diseases were generated partly by the filthiness of the pasturage, and partly by a want of change, which I believe to be principal causes of many of your cattle diseases. We now give far more attention to the cleanliness and health of the animal than in our world was formerly bestowed on the poor.

In every field is a shady spot, contrived to protect the animals from the sun during the heat of the day. The ground being very undulating, a shade is obtained by merely throwing out, from the higher land above, some wood or other material to serve as a roof.

In case of illness among the animals, the great remedy used is a particular kind of electricity, which gives an impulse to the blood and changes the humours. This, with diet and care, is the only expedient employed to restore the animal to health. If a female animal is of a sickly nature and likely to give birth to inferior beasts, she is quietly put out of the way.

The Male alone Killed.

To the care taken of the beasts is greatly due the perfection of their breed and to a certain extent their numbers; but the law that contributes most to the marvellous increase of our flocks and herds is that which forbids the slaughter of the female. In every species the male only is used for food. If we killed the mother, we should, as it were, kill the progeny that would otherwise be bred from her, and our immense stocks would not then be a hundredth part as numerous as they are at present.

The cow, after she has ceased bearing, is used to carry the women's baskets, or for very light draughts. The ewe, when she has ceased bearing, is trained to assist in field and garden operations, to pull up cabbages, carrots, and other vegetables, being, in short, more useful to us than the dog.

OCCASIONAL NOTES.

Mr G. A. Macfarren has been appointed Principal of the Royal Academy of Music, in the place of the late Sir Sterndale Bennett. A wiser choice could not possibly have been made. Who is to succeed Sir Sterndale as Musical Professor at the University of Cambridge has not yet been made known.

Mr Arthur Sullivan has accepted the late Sir Sterndale Bennett's Composition Class at the Royal Academy of Music.

Among those who attended the burial of Sir Sterndale Bennett, last Saturday, in Westminster Abbey, was Mr Frederick Davison, chief of the great organ firm of Gray and Davison.

Funeral of the late Sir Sterndale Bennett.—We are instructed to state that the Honourable Mortimer Sackville-West, Groom-in-Waiting to the Queen, attended at Westminster Abbey, by Her Majesty's special and gracious command, on the above occasion.

The following notice has been lately placarded very liberally in Paris:—

CHEST C !!!

The Sozzo Method.

Method for enabling every one to emit the high chest C. Thirty lessons and a month of medical treatment are sufficient. Thirty days in all.

I rely upon my success and my experience.

When every one is able to emit the high chest C, singers will discover that, as the compass of their voice rises, their remuneration will fall in exactly the same ratio; so that they would probably not be much benefited should M. Sozzo's method prove as effective as M. Sozzo intimates it to be.

The first part of the next Monday Popular Concert (February 15), is to be devoted exclusively to works by Sterndale Bennett. Marie Krebs will play his sonata, The Maid of Orleans, which was composed expressly for Arabella Goddard. Our great English pianist could hardly be better represented than by this gifted young German.

Royal Albert Hall Concerts.—The third Popular Ballad Concert will take place this evening (Saturday), the 13th inst. Mdme Lemmens-Sherrington, Miss Annie Sinclair, Miss Antoinette Sterling, Mr Cummings, and Mr Whitney will be the vocalists. Herr Wilhelmj will play Ernst's "Elegie," and his own paraphrase of Chopin's larghetto, and several part-songs and madrigals will be given by the Part-Song Choir of the Royal Albert Hall Choral Society, under Mr Barnby's direction. The next orchestral concert is announced for Tuesday, the 16th inst., when the late Sir Sterndale Bennett's overture, Paradise and the Peri, and Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony," will be notable features of interest. On this occasion Herr Wilhelmj will introduce "Paganini's Concerto," a work of enormous difficulty, and he will also play Bach's "Chaconne" for violin alone. It will, doubtless, be interesting to musical amateurs to know that the violin used by Herr Wilhelmj is a very valuable instrument, being a genuine Stradivarius; and that he has on two separate occasions been offered as much as 1,000 guineas for it since his arrival in England this season.

CONCERTS VARIOUS.

Miss Blanche Roope, a young and intelligent pianist, gave her evening concert in the Store Street Rooms, under the direction of Mr Lansdowne Cottell. Miss Roope played Mendelssohn's "Rondo Capriccioso," a solo by Herr Willem Coenen (for the left hand), and her own capital arrangement of Irish airs. Miss Edith Shield, a young vocalist, gave the late Vincent Wallace's "Song of May," and was loudly encored; Miss Nina Monetta was obliged to repeat, at the unanimous desire of the audience, Benedict's "Rock me to sleep"; Mr Finlay Dunn, a Scotch tenor, sang the popular romance, "Alice, where art thou?" in perfection, and was also encored; Miss E. Fortescue, in Ignace Gibsone's pretty song, "Across the Sea," gained the sympathies of all present by her artless singing; Mr Fred Meldon, who possesses a pure and full bass voice, gave a song by Gounod in capital style; and Mr Kemble gave Mr Henry Phillip's "Woman." Mr Lansdowne Cottell accompanied the vocal music with his usual tact and judgment.

The sixth Harrow Thursday "Popular Concert," which took place on the 4th February, was, like its predecessors, dignified by a highly classical programme. In the first piece—Beethoven's F major quartet (Op. 59)—Messrs Otto Peiniger (the clever violinist and Professor at Harrow School), Szczepanowski, Amor, and Pettit, showed their thorough ability and artistic feeling in interpreting this celebrated composition of the old master. In the same way Mozart's D major quartet (No. 18) was successfully rendered. Herr Otto Peiniger introduced as his solo an air by Bach, and delighted the distinguished audience with his beautiful tone and breadth of style. We have had opportunities to hear this artist on former occasions, and can only express the heartiest wish that he soon will acquire the popularity he so fully deserves. The vocalists were Mrs Thaddeus Wells, who sang Spohr's "A bird sat on an alder bough," and an old English ballad, with great success; and Mr Henry Pyatt, who gave an air from Il Flauto Magico, and "The brave old oak" (both encored) with all the vigour which characterises a happy owner of a splendid bass voice. In looking through the programmes of the series, we can but heartily congratulate the committee, who, headed by the well-known maestro, Mr John Farmer, manage these concerts with so much taste and artistic sense.

PROVINCIAL.

Norwich.—The eminent pianist, Dr Hans von Bülow, gave a recital, in Nevarre's Rooms, on Friday, February 5th, in the presence of a large and fashionable audience, which received his various performances with enthusiastic applause. This is the only entertainment of any importance that has taken place since the advent of Madame Lemmens-Sherrington and party some two months ago; and though it is said to be a musical locality, we never remember being unhappy enough to reside in one where good concerts, etc., bore such a close resemblance to angelic visitations.—S. W. S.

Chatham.—A musical performance took place in the Mechanics' Institute on Tuesday evening, February 2nd, under the direction of Mr Lansdowne Cottell, which attracted a very full audience. The entertainment commenced by Miss Edith Shield singing Wallace's charming "Song of May," and receiving a "double encore." Mr H. Kemble, who possesses a good baritone voice, then gave a song by Lindpaintner, and "L'Ultimo pensiero," by Mariani. After various songs and duets had been sung by the Misses Fortescue, Lisle, Rica, &c., a selection was given, "in costume," by the same vocalists, assisted by an efficient chorus, from a comic opera by Mr Cottell, entitled The Archers. The whole gave evident pleasure, and was done every justice to by the young artists, under the direction of Mr Cottell, the composer and director.

Leeds.—On Monday evening, February 8th, Dr Spark, the borough organist, gave a concert in the Lecture Hall of the Church Institute, Leeds, when several of his pupils, most of whom have been educated by him for the musical profession, were introduced to the audience. Young as were many of the vocalists, they exhibited in most instances a high degree of proficiency and skill. The names of those who assisted were Miss E. Carey Walker, Miss M. E. Storey, Miss Jenny Taylor, Mr E. Kemp (tenor), Mr A. Williams (tenor), Mr S. Whittaker (bass), and Mr J. Bates (solo pianist). The audience was large. The first part of the entertainment was devoted to a recital of Dr Arne's operetta, Love in a Village, and the audience frequently intimated their satisfaction with the performance. In the miscellaneous portion of the programme, several solos were given, Mr J. Bates receiving an encore for a pianoforte fantasia. The pupils generally showed that much time must have been bestowed in bringing them to the proficiency they had attained.

Nuremberg.—M. Gounod's Roméo et Juliette has been produced at the Stadttheater.

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

Herr Joseph Joachim's re-appearance on the scene of these concerts is always a gala occasion, and St James's Hall was crowded to its utmost capacity last Monday evening by amateurs eager to give the—we may say it—well-loved artist a cordial reception. Apart from Herr Joachim's rare gifts as a violinist, he has in a high degree the faculty of attracting sympathy. It is not, therefore, merely the great performer whom the public are so delighted to honour. It is to some extent the man himself, for whom the humblest occupant of the shilling seats, albeit he has never exchanged, nor hopes to exchange, a word with him, entertains a feeling of personal regard. The nature of Herr Joachim's reception can be imagined, and we need not describe it further than by saying, in simplest words, everybody was very glad to see him. Schubert's quartet in D minor opened the proceedings, and was played perfectly by MM. Joachim, Ries, Straus, and Piatti, the remarkable variations on a theme from the composer's song, "Der Tod und das Mädchen," again making a profound impression. The quaint final presto brought the quartet to an end, amid a perfect storm of applause, than which no honour was ever more justly deserved. Schumann's pianoforte quintet in E flat was the only other concerted work; but this afforded a rich treat to all who had learned to appreciate the deep and tender expression, the true poetry, and the masterful ideas characteristic of its composer's music. We must refer especially to the slow movement, which, in the respects just named, may take equal rank with the best slow movements of Beethoven. Into this Schumann must have thrown his whole soul; and it is hard not to believe that personal experience is reflected in the funeral solemnity of the principal theme, and in the bright but tender beauty of the episode which comes after it, like the voice of consolation. Few things in music are more suggestive than this; but the whole work exercises the charm of genius, and never relaxes its hold upon either imagination or intellect. The quintet could not have been better played than by Mr Franklin Taylor and the artists already named; nor could it have had a more sympathetic reception. Mr Taylor's solo was Beethoven's Sonata in E flat (Op. 29), which he executed with rare precision, delicacy, and intelligence. This gentleman is not a sensational performer, and may seem to lack even necessary warmth of manner; but he is a faithful and able interpreter, as well as a most skilful pianist—merits that justify the high position he has reached. He was unanimously called for at the end. Herr Joachim's individual contribution to the programme was the Andante and Allegro from Bach's Sonata in A minor, a work he introduced two years ago. Can it be necessary to state how it was played? Certainly not. Enough that Joachim was himself, and that, in obedience to an "encore" not to be resisted, he gave the Bourée ("Double") from the same composer's Sonata in B minor. Miss Enriquez sang Schubert's "Adina" and Buononcini's "L'Esperto nocchiero" so as to obtain a recall after each.

Brussels.—M. Félicien David's anxiously awaited opera, La Perle du Brésil, has at length been produced at the Théâtre Royal de la Monnaie. It did not go off as well as was expected, and the principal artists by no means unusually distinguished themselves. The mise-en-scène, however, was all that could be desired.—The Minister of the Interior has obtained from the Chamber of Representatives a grant of 20,000 francs to purchase an organ for the Conservatory. Opinions were divided as to whether the instrument should be ordered of M. Cavaillé-Coll, of Paris, or of MM. Schyven and Co., of Brussels. At length it was decided that the Belgian builders should have the preference.

Baireuth.—Speaking of the Niebelungen Trilogy, a Frankfort paper says that the first pianoforte rehearsals will take place at the commencement of July, and that each of the Trilogies will be rehearsed with the orchestra during the last three weeks of the same month. The performances will, according to the present plan, take place as follows:—On the first Sunday in August, at 4 o'clock p.m., Rheingold; on Monday, at the same hour, Die Walkyren; on Tuesday, Siegfried; and on Wednesday, Die Götterdämmerung. After each act there will be a considerable pause, to enable the actors—and the public—to recover from the strain to which they will have been subjected. The second performance of the operas, in the same order, is fixed for the second week in August, and the third performance for the third week.

PRESENTATION TO SIR JULIUS BENEDICT.

(From the "Liverpool Daily Post," Feb. 10.)

As our readers are aware, Sir Julius Benedict, the esteemed and distinguished leader of the Philharmonic Society's orchestra, has attained his seventieth year; and the occasion was one of which his very many friends thought they might fitly avail themselves in order to present him with some mark of the regard in which he is held. The shareholders in the Philharmonic Hall, the members of the chorus, and other Liverpool friends, all cordially joined in the subscription for a national testimonial; but the members of the band felt such a close personal intimacy with Sir Julius that they desired, on their own part, to present him with some little token; and accordingly got up a separate subscription list. Sufficient funds having thus been raised, a very handsome silver inkstand was purchased from the establishment of Messrs Clark and Drielsma, of Church Street, and this was presented to Sir Julius yesterday afternoon during a rehearsal for an evening concert. The inkstand was a very neat and chaste piece of workmanship, and bore the following inscription:—

"Presented to Sir Julius Benedict by the members of the band of the Liverpool Philharmonic Society, on the anniversary of his seventieth birthday."

The presentation was made by Mr Haddock, the oldest resident member of the band, who said:—

"Sir Julius,—The task has been assigned to me of informing you that we, the members of the band of the Philharmonic Society, have taken advantage of the seventieth anniversary of your birthday to present to you a silver inkstand as a testimonial in recognition of your high and distinguished qualities, and as bearing witness to the firm confidence we repose in you as our conductor. I think it right to mention that we have gone against the wishes of some of our friends in this matter. We have been recommended, if we had anything to contribute, to send it to London, and let it form part of the general testimonial fund. In one sense that might have been the wisest course to pursue. But it was not quite what we wished to do. We thought, after deliberation and consulting together, that something in the shape of a testimonial coming direct to you from us would serve better as a means of conveying our sentiments and our regard and esteem for you. We have been wishful, Sir Julius, that whatever we might offer you should be appropriate, and, if possible, useful, and we have been led to the selection of an inkstand as a suitable object by the consideration of the number, magnitude and importance of the works you have given to the world. In the process of writing so much as you have done you will have consumed great quantities of ink, and worn out pens beyond amount, and it is very probable that a few inkstands have come to grief. Be that as it may, an inkstand, we thought, would be both appropriate and useful. In begging your acceptance of it, we all unite in hoping and trusting that you may have many years of health. Health is the chief good. With health your energy and determination will never leave you. You will go on in the old way writing; and if, through our little testimonial, you should be sometimes reminded of the Liverpool Philharmonic Society, and kindly feelings should be awakened in your breast towards the members of the band, our object will have been accomplished."

Sir Julius Benedict, in responding, said:—

"Mr Haddock and gentlemen of the band—I cannot express to you my feelings of deep and sincere gratitude for this very handsome testimonial of your regard and esteem for me. As Mr Haddock has observed, it has been my happy lot to have been associated with you for now nearly eight years, and during that time we have had our ups and downs in our performances, as happens in the best regulated families. There have been here and there shortcomings—it may have been on my side or on yours—I won't investigate too closely—but there is one thing I will say both for you and myself—namely, that there has always been an earnest desire to do our best, and that whatever the work which has been entrusted to me for performance I have ever given it the most assiduous and careful attention. If there has been any shortcoming it must be attributed to the weakness of human nature, which we all know is never infallible. A testimonial like this, however, was not needed from you to show me how kind you are to me, and how willing you are at all times to follow my advice and my bâton. That need not be enlarged upon, but I cannot but repeat that no such testimonial was needed to convince me of your good and kind feeling towards me. I am now, as the inscription on your testimonial reminds me, at the more than ripe age of seventy, but, as Mr Haddock has well observed, health is the principal consideration, and though thirty years might be a great deal for many younger men to boast of, I can truly say that for forty years past I have never consulted a physician—except as a friend. I hope, therefore, that under Providence I may yet be spared to give you my time and assistance, and to continue what has always been to me a labour of love. According to the ordinary lot of humanity the number of my years must now, of course, be very limited, but still I think, as long as one feels the power, the strength, and the understanding for great works of art, whatever the sphere in which they may be, and as long as one has the enthusiasm which in me is as young now as it was fifty years ago, I don't see the necessity of withdrawing. I have had a good deal of experience in my profession; I have been brought up to it as a boy; I have served my time to it as a private soldier, so to speak, and I have been under the guidance of the best masters—German, Italian, and English—and I may, therefore, perhaps, claim a certain right to occupy a post which, whilst it is responsible, is at the same time honourable. I will not detain you longer, gentlemen, but will only tell you again that I feel deeply grateful for this testimonial of your regard for me, and that my feelings towards you are also equally strong. Whatever the occasion or the opportunity in which I can be of use to the members of this orchestra, I shall always consider it my duty to do whatever I can to serve you, and perhaps I may be permitted to say that I feel on some occasions proof that I do not shrink from that responsibility. I hope you will continue to grant me your indulgence, and that if there should be any shortcoming on my part you will continue to bestow that attention and that care on your duties which alone can ensure a perfect performance of the works entrusted to me, whilst you may depend that upon my part there shall never be wanting the best wishes for your welfare, your success, and your prosperity. Again, gentlemen, I thank you for your very great kindness."

The proceedings then terminated.

SIGNORA CHIOMI.

A young English artist has recently obtained the marked approval of a Milanese audience. Signora Chiomi, who had previously sung at Oporto, Turin, and other Italian cities, achieved a complete success on her début at the Carcano. The Gazetta dei Teatri says:—

"A sweet, graceful, and very young artist is Mdlle Chiomi, to whom nature has been prodigal in her gifts. Her voice, beautiful, and in tune in the highest degree, has passionate accents. Her singing betrays the excellent school in which she has learned the rudiments of her art. She knows how to transfuse her soul into her voice, and every note for her is but the expression of a sentiment. The press generally sounds the note of approbation of this young and distinguished artist, who to the graces of her person, and to a voice beautiful, sweet, and expressive, unites a high degree of artistic intelligence."

The Pungolo says:—

"The Signora Chiomi, a graceful and beautiful artist, who has come amongst us preceded by good reports, has concentrated general expectation. She did not disappoint us. Sustained and dignified in her movements, she sang well, and with power, all through the opera, and gave with much elegance of style and with expression, the 'Romance of the Rose,' which roused the applause of the audience, followed by calls to the proscenium, which, in the succeeding duet, were shared with the tenor, Armandi-Villa."

The Perseveranza says:—

"She seems to have studied singing with care, intelligence, and passion. She sang with grace and correctness the beautiful 'Romance of the Rose.'"

The Gazzetta Musicale writes:—

"At the Carcano, we have had Marta the last few evenings well interpreted by the Signora Chiomi, tolerably by the tenor, Armandi-Villa, and the baritone, Moragas. The Signora Chiomi has gained the caresses of the critics—caresses well merited. She is beautiful, has long fair hair, a sweet voice, and great capabilities."

The Lombardia is full of praises and encomiums, and writes thus:—

"The Signora Chiomi, the leading artist, is a young and very fair stranger, who, for the first time, sang in Milan. She was warmly applauded in the romance, and in the duet with the tenor in Act III."

The opinion expressed by the Avvisatore del Commercio is most friendly, and describes the débutante as singing "in the most exquisite style of the Italian school," pronouncing Italian as even many natives fail to do, and possessing "a lithe and graceful figure, eyes in which you can read sweetness, yet which flash with rare intelligence, a mellow, flexible, passionate voice, with self-possession, and distinction of gesture and movement."

The Sole and the Fama, whose critic is Signor Cominazzi, one of the Nestors of the Milanese press, write also in terms of high approval.

A BALL AT THE PARIS OPERAHOUSE.

Even amid the excitement caused by the elections, the first ball at the New Opera created much interest, results have been expected from it which do not seem to have been realized. One of the great economical mistakes of France is the belief that a ball or 100 balls can bring back that unprecedented prosperity which accrued of forty years of peace and settled government; for if the Empire by its magic historical associations knew how to give France the wealth which is still in existence, this arose not only from its representing 20 years of industry and economy, but from its succeeding to 20 years of peace without uneasiness, of thrift without disturbance, of peaceful labour without warlike interruption. To-day, or rather ever since the war, the well-being of the country has been attributed to the luxury and prodigality of Paris, as a brilliant, inexhaustible focus; and thus confusing effects with causes, people fancy that by getting up balls they will efface the traces left by a fatal and disastrous war.

Even viewed from this erroneous standpoint, yesterday's ball did not prove a very successful device for Parisian trade, for gentlemen were to ladies in the proportion of ten to one; and everybody knows that it is not male toilette which makes the fortunes of shopkeepers. It has been ascertained that out of 18,000 tickets sold, there were only 800 for ladies, making a total receipt of 152,000*f.*—that is to say, 7,200 gentlemen's tickets at 20*f.*, and 800 ladies' tickets, at 10*f.* Now, considering that at least 400 of the ladies did not stir from their boxes, and that only 300 or 400 moved about among the 8,000 black coats—for the 7,200 tickets sold do not include those given away—an idea may be formed of the far from gay appearance presented by the hall and the foyers. At the very threshold, moreover, gaiety, it may be said, was checked on the lips of the arrivals Much fault had been found, especially on the opening day, with the discouraging gloom of the façade: but this defect, which under ordinary circumstances is without real importance, becomes striking when masked balls are in question. The isolated position of the building, moreover, does not conduce to that contagious gaiety which coursed as it were through all the veins of the old Opera. People remembered the enlivening effect of the great pyramidal gas jets which lit up the corner of the Rue Lepeletier and the Boulevards: the Paris Guards on horseback, who remained immovable in the full glare of the Boulevards and the gas jets; the masks who passed close along the brilliantly lit up and crowded pavements before entering the hall, into which, from midnight till 4 am., Parisian folly poured itself. Now, last night the front of the Opera, which has cost France 40,000,000*f.*, remained immersed in impenetrable obscurity; lamps without brilliancy replaced the pyramids of gas jets, and the crowd, kept at a respectful distance, greeted with ironical laughter the few masks who appeared afar off. When the silent terrace had been crossed and one penetrated below those solemn and impoeing vaults, which are like the arches of a cloister, the doors opened and one mounted the step of the staircase, from the top of which half the public scanned every disguised woman as she went through the double ordeal of criticism and laughter.

Above the broad passage, dimly lighted to stifle laughter as it rose to the lips, and in spite of oneself, one began to speak in a whisper. Yesterday more than ever no doubt, sonorous laughter was silenced by those passages at once lonely and thronged, for black coats have this strange property that they will take up space without forming a crowd. But the days which used to be the pride and delight of the Parisians are far distant. In those days some malicious daughter of Eve would, under the protection of the domino, tell some unsuspecting visitor, to his astonishment, many things which he thought were known to him alone. Now all this has gone out of fashion. Women are no longer sufficiently good natured to chaff without spite, and men have not sufficient refinement to be at once witty and well bred. What is now heard, when anything is heard,—for yesterday nobody spoke to anybody,—are commonplaces without end; jokes of questionable taste, and language which has obtained popularity in by streets. When I heard a domino for the first time say to a luckless visitor, "I know you; you have got a dog which follows you like remorse and a wife who avoids you like a plague," I was very nearly prepared to find again the long lost French wit; but when I had heard it repeated five or six times without distinction to men who had neither dog nor wife nor remorse, I bethought me that human folly was strutting insolently in a palace. I looked in vain for a spark of that sparkling mirth of yore. The country is hit more seriously than is generally thought, and its people laugh sadly now that they fear to provoke a smile.

ROYAL ALBERT HALL CONCERTS.

As far as the new series of these concerts has gone it fully bears out the promise of the directors to secure increased efficiency. Oratorios, orchestral music, and compositions of a more "popular" order, are still given in their turn; but, with more time for preparation and with improved means, the performances are so much bettered that it is hard to find reasonable ground for complaint against them. Since our last notice this has been very satisfactorily demonstrated with regard to oratorio, by an execution of Israel in Egypt which reflected the utmost credit upon all concerned. The chorus, so ably trained by Mr Barnby, mustered in full force, and acquitted themselves better than ever before of a most onerous task. To say that there were no faults in the rendering of Handel's trying music would imply the attainment of an impossible perfection; but the merit shown was certainly exceptional, and as such we acknowledge it. The band, wisely increased to a hundred instruments—a degree of strength that should be maintained—did its work admirably; and the solos, entrusted to Mdlle Levier, Miss Sterling, and Signor Fabrini, if not equal in merit, were on the whole acceptably sung. With the excellence of this concert may be compared that of the latest devoted to orchestral music, a special feature in which was the performance by Herr Wilhelmj of a violin concerto new to this country, his own arrangement for violin and orchestra, of Wagner's "Albumblatt," and a Nocturne by Chopin. The concerto is the work of Herr F. Hégar, a Zurich musician, an ex-pupil of the Leipsic Conservatoire, and a composer whose songs and choral music have achieved popularity. Interesting from the peculiar form it exhibits, the concerto has other and more genuine attractions, arising out of melodic richness, and the graceful manner in which the orchestra is combined with the solo instrument, so as to make the most of each. We shall hear the work again with pleasure, especially if Herr Wilhelmj plays it in the astonishingly perfect manner shown on the occasion under notice. This great artist's performance, both of the concerto and the smaller pieces, was a marvel of executive skill. Beauty of tone, depth of expression, and technical ability of the rarest order, entitle Herr Wilhelmj to the honours bestowed on those who, though they may have rivals, know no superior, and his presence in England should be valued as enabling amateurs to make further acquaintance with a violinist of phenomenal power. Another interesting feature of this concert was a capital performance of Mendelssohn's Italian symphony; and Mr Sullivan's masterly overture, "In Memoriam"—perhaps our English composer's very best work for the orchestra, not only because of superior technical skill, but because it abounds in that strong and earnest feeling without which no music can reach the soul of its hearers. Miss Levier, a real artist, if ever there was one, sang some German lieder charmingly, obtaining an encore for Brahms' "Wiegenlied;" and, between the parts, the "Dead March" was played as a tribute of respect to the memory of Sterndale Bennett.

A Ballad concert took place on Saturday last, supported by Miss Levier, Miss Sterling, Mr Lloyd, and Mr Whitney, with Herr Wilhelmj, Herr Rudolph Niemann (piano), and Mr G. Martin (organ) as solo instrumentalists. The excellent part-song choir of the Albert Hall Choral Society also attended, and gained much applause for a selection of favourite works. Miss Sterling was encored in Gatty's "The Hay is i' the mow," Macirone's setting of "O, hush thee, my babie," and Hullah's "Three Fishers." Mr Lloyd was similarly complimented in Barnby's graceful song, "My summer time;" nor were recalls wanting in other instances of exceptional merit. Herr Wilhelmj's performance of the variations from Beethoven's "Kreutzer" Sonata made a great effect, and the lesser solos were well received. Altogether, the concert, conducted by Mr Barnby, was one of much and varied attraction.

On Wednesday evening the Messiah was performed, with Madame Sherrington, Miss Spiller, Madame Patey, Mr Rigby, and Mr Whitney as soloists.

THE "TOCSIN ALLÉGORIQUE" OF IGNACE PLEYEL.*

What member of the musical world does not know, at any rate, by tradition, the fertile composer Ignace Pleyel, the pupil of Joseph Haydn? He was born in Austria in 1757, and, after spending a large portion of his life in France, which he considered as his adopted country, died in Paris, the 14th November 1831. There still exist numerous compositions of his for pianoforte and violin, quartets, quintets, sonatas, etc., which, once known to all Europe, are now condemned to oblivion. His School for the Pianoforte, though not highly esteemed by the Prince of pianists, Ludwig van Beethoven, once played a great part in musical education and was used in some establishments till very recently.

In 1789, this composer, already very well known, was Chapelmaster at the Cathedral of Strasburgh, some of his predecessors in the post having become famous. Pleyel, however, had not time to distinguish himself there, because, in the revolutionary whirlwind, which then redoubled its violence, it was not long before he lost his appointment. He had, therefore, no great reason to love the Revolution, and he was not too particular in disguising his feelings for the unfortunate queen, Marie Antoinette. This circumstance, combined with the fact of his being an Austrian, could not long fail to render him an object of suspicion. The gendarmerie received orders to watch him at a country house of his in Dorlisheim, and his position became one of extreme danger. If he had been brought before a revolutionary tribunal, he would certainly have been condemned to death. It was under these circumstances that some of his best friends advised him to declare himself openly a Republican, and to prove it by turning revolutionary composer. Now as Pleyel did not much relish being guillotined, as, indeed, very few persons do, he consented to write a work, unique in its kind and entitled: La Révolution du 12 août, 1792, ou Tocsin allégorique. There is now only a single copy left, and it is justly regarded at Strasburgh as a precious score. Pleyel's republicanism being of such recent date, it was deemed becoming to assign him as a companion an amiable gendarme, who never lost sight of him during the composition of the Tocsin allégorique, which is, without doubt, the most original of all his works, and, as I was assured by a friend of mine, a brave musician and faithful German, during my sojourn of a month at Strasburgh in the year 1835, contains some portions which Beethoven would certainly not have despised. There were at Strasburgh, in those days of continual disturbance, 900 bells, taken from the villages and small towns of Alsace. These bells had become useless, as people then said, after the abolition of the Christian religion, Roman Catholic and Protestant, and were destined to be transformed into pieces of five or ten centimes. Pleyel obtained permission to choose an unlimited number of them for the execution of his work, which was to take place in the Cathedral. He selected seven giving the notes C, E, B, G, A, F, D.

The following is an epitome of his strange production. The Introduction, "The Awakening of the People," allegro moderato, 4-4 in F major, commences softly, and increases with a dull rumour marked continuously by the mournful sounds of the wind instruments. The confusion at last becomes a fearful storm, the attack on the Tuileries, which dealt a fatal blow to the King of France, having reached its highest pitch, the tumult decreases little by little, and very soon appears lost in secondary kinds of agitation. After 97 bars, we hear the first stroke of the bell in C; at the 9th bar afterwards there is added the second in E; at the tenth, the bell in C leaves off, and, at the thirteenth, the bells in G unite with those in E, as, at the 19th, do that in F and that in C. Amid the sounds of the bells, the stringed instruments vibrate most energetically in unison. After 51 bars of this alarum-ringing of the Churches of Paris, we suddenly hear the bell in D, while the drums beat the générale, accompanied by the fifes. New confusion, 6-4 in D major, the effect in the orchestra being augmented gradually by the sound of the bells, at first isolated, then doubled, in B and in A, and lastly in F and G. This surprising instrumentation grows fainter; the wind instruments are silent, and the quartet no longer expresses more than the mournful sighs of the wounded and the dying. Suddenly the Royalists appear singing Grétry's celebrated air: "O, Richard, ô, mon roi!" But, at the seventh bar, the terrible music of the fight, in 6-4, breaks forth with renewed vigour. It is followed by sweet and gentle harmony, adagio, quickly interrupted by an allegro, expressing courage and daring. A number of harmonious chords in A major lead up to another very well known air of Grétry's: "Où peut-on être mieux . . .?" But at the conclusion of these strains, the report of the cannon is heard in the distance. Amid a revolutionary tempest, the home joys of family are of short duration. There is an indescribable rumour; the warlike kettle-drums grow animated, and lead, crescendo, at the double quick, 6-8, to the furious struggle between the two principles: the Republic and Royalty. It is here that the Alsatians assert Pleyel raised himself to the height of the Titan, Beethoven. The instrumentation is fearfully effective: the roar of the cannon, the sounds of the bells in B, D, G, C, F, and E, and the roll of the drums. . . . the kettle-drums, too, come out with prodigious force. At length, the chaos seems to have sunk into silence; the quartet ends in tones of lamentation, but suddenly the drums and kettle-drums announce the sanguinary triumph. A powerful chorus accompanied by brilliant instrumental music in D, 4-4, pronounces the words: La victoire est à nous; le peuple est sauvé!" To this is united, with accompaniment of the orchestra which performs the famous "Ça ira," a four-part chorus 2-4, allegro, which sings the following verses, revolutionary both as regards words and music:—

"Nous t'offrons les débris d'un trône,
Sur ces autels, ô sainte Liberté.
De l'eternelle verité
Ce jour enfin qui nous environne (?)
Rend tout un peuple à la félicité;
Par sa vertu, par sa fierté
Il conquiert l'équalité.
Parmi nos héros la foudre qui tonne
L'annonce au loin à l'humanité.

A WOMAN (sola).

Mon fils vient d'expirer,
Mais je n'ai plus de roi!

Romance.

Il fut à son pays avant d'être à moi,
Et j'étais citoyenne avant d'être mère.
Mon fils! par tes vertus, j'honore ta poussière!"

Immediately after the last bar of the chorus: "Nous t'offrons les débris d'un trône," the noisy music of the "Ça ira" is again introduced. A soprano then sings two strophes of rampant republicanism commencing:—

"Ah! périsse l'idolâtrie
Qu'on voue à la royauté,
Terre ne soit qu'une patrie,
Qu'un seul temple à l'humanité," etc.

The following third strophe is sung by a tenor:

"Les Français qu'on forme à la guerre,
Appellent contre les tyrants
Les représailles de la terre
Du haut des palais fumants.
Des bords du Gange à ceux du Tibre,
Dieu! rends bientôt selon nos vœux
Tout homme un citoyen heureux,
Le genre humain un peuple libre."

The chorus repeats the last two lines, and then the baritone comes in with the recitative.

"Nous finirons son esclavage;
Ce grand jour en est le présage."

The work finishes with a brilliant coda of the chorus "Nous t'offrons," etc., always accompanied by the music of "Ça ira."

On the day that the Tocsin allégorique was performed for the first time, the magnificent Cathedral was literally invaded by the crowd, and the Strasburghers, more or less old, said, in 1835, that the public was overpowered by indescribable enthusiasm. The cries of "Vive Pleyel" "Vive la République" resounded on all sides, and Pleyel was immediately freed from the custody of the gendarme, it being said that no one but a true patriot, and a foe to slavery could have produced such a master-piece. the numerous republican verses dedicated to Pleyel, the following are perhaps the least bad :—

"A PLEYEL.

"(Compositeur des Peuples régénérés.)

"Ce qu'un mortel n'ouït jamais,
Ton Tocsin aux peuples révèle,
Foudroyant le vieux, le mauvais,
Il proclame l'ÈRE NOUVELLE."

The success of this revolutionary composition increased with every performance. People flocked from far and wide to hear it, and Pleyel had never been so popular. What, however, did he do, in 1793, in the midst of his unasked-for triumph? Not wishing to lose his prestige, he suddenly disappeared, like a prudent musician, and went to London. Despite of this, the Tocsin did not cease to be the rage. It was transported from the Cathedral Choir to the grand Mirror Concert Room, which was closed with it in 1798. The following year it was performed in the new room of the Réunion des Arts. Soon afterwards, however, nothing more was heard of this music of the New Era. The Consulate was not propitious to it; Bonaparte preferred for his governmental regimen calming to exciting music.

It is a somewhat remarkable fact that the seven bells selected by Pleyel for his Tocsin allégorique, thanks to the musical purpose to which they were devoted, escaped the fate of the rest. Five were restored, after the re-establishment of the Christian religion, to their legitimate owners. One, which was accidently taken to the Strasburgh Theatre, perished in 1800, when that edifice was burnt down, and, lastly, the seventh, the one in E, was preserved in 1835 at the Office of the City Archives. A strange page in the history of music is this revolutionary work of Pleyel's!

"BROTHER JACK!"

(Copyright reserved.)

Why, brother Jack! What cheer, old boy?
I'm home for good—my flag is struck.
You're looking worn, and grey, old man,
And altogether out of luck.
We haven't met for many a-year,
But now we meet again once more,
I'd like to see your dear old smile,
To greet me now I'm safe on shore.

We're brothers, ain't we, still, old man?—
Lord love us! what a time ago
Since we were curly-headed boys—
Dear heart! it makes my eyes o'erflow!
The kind old mother!—Jack, d'ye mind
The poor old soul's sad tears for me,
When to her heart she held me fast,
That day I first went off to sea?

And so she's gone, you tell me, Jack!
And things have mostly queered a bit—
The crops been bad; the cattle died;
And with it all you're sadly hit.
'Taint all smooth sailing, Jack, d'ye see;
There's storms about for most poor men,
But keep her head well up to wind—
You'll mostly steer to port again.

We'll work the farm together, lad!
We'll rig anew the dear old home;
I'll blow my cloud, and spin a yarn
About the seas I used to roam.
And when the CAPTAIN's signal comes,
To slip our cables, this our prayer:
That He'll in mercy take us both,
To join the dear old mother—there!

LONDON BALLAD CONCERTS.

There were twenty-seven pieces—vocal and instrumental—in the programme of Mr John Boosey's fifth concert, and a crowded as well as delighted audience managed to secure the acceptance of encores for all above nineteen. The repetition of others was asked, and hearty applause, in greater or less degree, fell to the lot of every one. After this bare statement of fact, it cannot be necessary to point out that the entertainment was a marked success; and when a ballad concert may be so described, a good deal may be involved in the way of thorough enjoyment, and almost childlike enthusiasm. It does one good to see Mr Boosey's audience, what time, songs and singers are to the public taste, and encores are granted with promptitude, for then "killing care and grief of heart" have no lodgment in St James's Hall.

It would be of little use to go through the programme item by item; let us, therefore, note only the chief successes, the greatest of which were gained by Mr Santley. Our popular baritone first sang Hatton's "Fair is my love," for which he might have accepted an encore. His next song, Pinsuti's "Free Lance," was imperatively re-demanded, as was the old Ballad about a "Leather Bottell." Responding on this last occasion, Mr Santley gave two verses, but the audience were bent upon getting another song, out of their favourite, and gained "My Polly" for their pains. Mr Lloyd was twice recalled after singing Sullivan's "Love laid his sleepless head," and had to repeat the same composer's "Once again," as well as Austin's "Roll-call." Other encores were awarded to Miss Edith Wynne and Miss Antoinette Sterling, while the services of Madame Osborne Williams, Miss Josephine Laurence (piano), and the London Vocal Union were received with every mark of appreciation. In short, the entertainment could not possibly have been a greater success.

VIENNA.—As the Intendant of the Imperial Operahouse declined to re-engage Mad. Friedrich Materna on the terms she demanded, namely, 17,000 florins a year, the lady has accepted an engagement at the Hamburgh Stadttheater, the manager of which has consented to give the terms in question.—On her return from her triumphal tour through Germany, Miss Minnie Hauck appeared here for one evening only, as Rosina, in Il Barbiere. In the singing-lesson scene she sang songs in three languages—English, Italian, and French.

ROME.—Fate has been singularly unkind, this season, to Sig. Jacovacci, the manager of the Apollo. The theatre was to have been opened with Aida, Signore Stolz, Sanz, Signori Niccolini, Aldighieri, and Nannetti, sustaining the principal parts. Signora Sanz was taken ill before reaching this capital, and it was determined to commence the season with Les Huguenots, executed by Signore Wizjack, Pernini, Braccialini, Signori Niccolini and Castelmary. But Signora Wizjack, in her turn, was taken ill. The opening had to be deferred a day. At length, the theatre really did open, though Sig. Castelmary was somewhat indisposed the first night. The manager now determined that he would get up another opera, to alternate with Les Huguenots, so that he might give five performances a week, and thoroughly rehearse Aida. He chose La Forza del Destino, and confided the leading parts to Signora Stolz, Signori Masini, Aldighieri, Viganotti, and Nannetti. But a Preziosilla was wanting. A week was lost in finding one. A lady was engaged at Milan, but found, at rehearsal, utterly incapable of performing the character. She was politely shown the stage-door, and Signora Passigli engaged in her stead. Everything now seemed to be going on admirably, when Sig. Masini fell ill. No sooner had he recovered, ere Signora Stolz was attacked. But she determined not to give in, and the curtain went up for the first performance of La Forza del Destino. The audience welcomed warmly Signora Stolz on her first appearance. They soon perceived, however, that she was suffering under a severe cold. Sig. Masini, also, was received with applause, but he, likewise, was labouring from the effects of indisposition. In the first act, after unheard-of efforts to continue, Signora Stolz was obliged to retire. The piece then proceeded without a prima donna, but, in the second act, Sig. Masini was under the necessity of following the example set by Signora Stolz. As an opera cannot be satisfactorily performed without the tenor as well as without the prima donna, the curtain had to be dropt. There was a tremendous disturbance in the theatre, and the only means of pacifying the audience was to return them their money. After this, the theatre was opened for three nights a week with Les Huguenots and a ballet. Sig. Masini, not getting better, cancelled his engagement. It is to be hoped that, when it is produced, Aida will compensate the manager for the ill-luck which has hitherto attended him this year.

WAIFS.

Mr Howard Paul is performing in the United States in connection with the Soldene Opera Troupe. He appears in a musical vaudeville written by himself, entitled, Locked Out. Mr Paul returns to England in March or April.

We (Arcadian) desired to have printed, in our musical department this week, the names of the members of the Philharmonic Society's orchestra, but when the compositors had set up the first three—viz.: Lautensclager, Wendelschaefer, and Pfeiffenschneider, they struck, and refused to complete the list.

One of the new policemen in Elizabeth arrested a negro last week, who resisted so stoutly that the officer splintered his club over his head. At his examination at the station-house he was asked whether the officer had struck him with his club. "No, sah; not dat I's awah of," was the prompt reply.—N. Y. World.

Miss Nessie Goode, Miss Bolingbroke, Mr Henry Guy, and Mr Henry Pope, all students at the Royal Academy of Music, will sing the quartet, "God is a Spirit," from The Woman of Samaria, at the next Monday Popular Concert, the first part of which is to be devoted to the compositions of Sterndale Bennett.

It is evident that the Boston Journal does not think it necessary that the person it sends to criticize performances of opera bouffe should understand French, as its critic recently got off these sentences: "Unfortunately, the enjoyment of the occasion was seriously marred by the want of librettos, these having failed to arrive from New York in season. Accordingly, although the story of the play may be made out, in a measure, by following the action, we will not venture to tell it, but await a more favourable opportunity."

Referring to Professor Oakeley's New Funeral March and its recent performance in Edinburgh, the Scotsman says:—

"A feature of the concert looked forward to with special interest was Professor Oakeley's recently-written Funeral March, performed for the first time, and conducted, at the desire of the Choral Union, by the composer. It came into the programme, alas, with strange appropriateness, inasmuch as yesterday morning had brought the sad tidings of the loss which music has sustained in the premature death of the greatest composer whom England has produced in the present generation. We would be disposed to assign the March a very high place among the writings of the present incumbent of our music chair. Impressive from beginning to end, it possesses a degree of originality which is extremely difficult of attainment in a composition of its class. The key is the same as that of Beethoven's famous march in the Eroica symphony, C minor; the melody is touching, the harmonization very fine and varied, and the scoring displays an unusual command of orchestral resources. The wail of intense grief in the introduction, the deep sadness of the opening strain, where the measured tread of the mourners is so well suggested in the bass, the consolatory ray of hope mingled with regret in the middle movement in the major key, and the less blank despair on the recurrence of the original subject after the close of the trio, made themselves felt and appreciated."

It is a deeply interesting and noteworthy fact, that among all the busy workers in letters this day, possibly the most vigorous, and certainly not the least cheerful, are five men who have long since passed the grand climacteric, and who, with a single exception, have filled the allotted term of threescore and ten years with unremitting brain work. The long-lived and active spirits we refer to are none other than Victor Hugo, Carlyle, Emerson, Bryant, and Longfellow, whose average age equals the years of the present century, and whose memory shall outlive many centuries yet to come. One and all, they are apparently as eager, and, we rejoice to say, as capable for work, as they were half a century since. Hugo—whose life and writings were reviewed but lately at considerable length in our columns—is engaged, at his present age of seventy-three, on a great poem, entitled, "Les Quatre Vents de l'Esprit"; Carlyle, at seventy-four, is writing a "History of the Norse Kings;" Emerson, at seventy-two, is composing a "Critical Dissertation on Poetry;" and Bryant and Longfellow, at the respective ages of eighty and sixty-eight, are producing verses which, as a writer in the World justly observes, present a pleasing contrast to the less hopeful plaints of our younger bards. The question then arises, What is it that moves men who have drunk unstintedly of fame, and who can appraise the bubble reputation at its true value—what is it moves them to ply their pens at an age when they might be expected to find their chief delight in the undisturbed repose they have so fairly earned? Literature may have lost for them its early fascinations, but the ardent passion for work which accompanies genius is not to be either quenched or cooled. The glow of active intellects is radiated in work for the blessing of their fellows; and if Mr Bryant, being eighty years of age, sits down to humour the Muse that has so long attended him, he doubtless can plead what must be the reason of every inspired poet—

I do but sing because I must,
And pipe but as the linnets sing.

—Arcadian.

The Archbishop of Canterbury has conferred the degree of Doctor in Music on William Henry Longhurst, Esq., Organist of Canterbury Cathedral.

The late Sir W. Sterndale Bennett's beautiful work, The Woman of Samaria, was performed, on Monday evening last, at the Prince of Wales Assembly Rooms, by the Scarborough Amateur Vocal and Instrumental Society (conductor, Dr Sloman). In the miscellaneous selection, which formed the second part of the concert, was introduced a new song by Dr Sloman, "No Tidings," which was enthusiastically received by the large and distinguished audience.

NAPLES.—It is nearly certain that Sig. Musella will open the San Carlo without any grant from the Corporation. But everything depends on whether the chorus will, or will not, accept lower terms than last season. Should they consent, I Puritani, Aida, La Forza del Destino, and the ballet of Le Figlie di Cheope, are mentioned as among the works to be produced.

BERLIN.—Subsequent performances have confirmed the favourable impression produced at the Royal Operahouse by Herr Richard Wüerst's comic opera, A-ing-fo-hi, on the first night of its production. Of the artists engaged in it, Herr Salomon and Madlle Lehmann most distinguished themselves. Herr Betz, Herr Sachs, and Mad. Kupfer-Berger did not make as much of their parts as they might have done.—At the Friedrich-Wilhelmstädtisches Theater, Giroflé-Girofla alternates in the bills with La Fille de Mad. Angot and Fledermaus, but not one of these three works is very attractive. The management are said to have resolved on producing Lortzing's Wildschütz, and, likewise, Die Beiden Schützen. Should these prove successful, the management, it is further reported, will revive various operas by Dittesdorf, Schenk, Kauer, Wenzel Müller, and others.—On the 10th April, when her engagement expires, Mad. Mallinger will leave the Royal Operahouse. She will not accept a fresh permanent engagement, but adopt the "starring" plan. In April, she will sing at the theatres in Dortmund and Strassburg. In May, she will sing in various operas by Herr Richard Wagner at Munich.—The principal items in the programme of Herr Joseph Wieniawski's second concert were Schubert's "Wanderer Fantaisie," Op. 15; several pieces by Chopin; Fugue in E minor, Handel; Gavotte, B minor, J. S. Bach; "Nocturne," J. Field; "Perpetuum mobile," C. M. von Weber; and various original compositions of the concert-giver.—Professor Stern being prevented by illness from conducting at the last Reichshallen-Concert, was replaced by Herr Janka, who proved an efficient substitute. Dr Hermann Zopf, however, himself conducted a "Fest-Ouverture" of his own, which would have been more successful had the fancy in it equalled the erudition. Madlle Langner gained golden opinions by her rendering of Juno's air from Handel's Semele. Herr Michal Herts played Chopin's F minor Concerto. The second part of the concert was taken up exclusively by Schumann's E flat major Symphony.

DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE,

For invigorating and enriching the voice, and removing affections of the throat.

DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE is universally acknowledged to be the most valuable remedy for sore throat, hoarseness and relaxed throat. It should always be taken before singing or reciting, as it strengthens the vocal organs. It is most extensively prescribed by the faculty for the throat and voice. Dr Lewis of Basingstoke says he finds them most efficacious, and in Dr Copland's Dictionary of Practical Medicine (Longman & Co.), they are strongly recommended at pages 872 and 1492. They are used by all the greatest vocalists and orators in Europe, and have been established over a quarter of a century. Testimonials from Patti, Grisi, Lablache, Santley, &c. "Mr Edward Lloyd gave the audience an unexpected degree of pleasure by his very admirable interpretation of Schubert's lovely 'Serenade,' and made scarcely less impression by his elegant delivery of Balfe's truly beautiful melody, set to words by Jessica Rankin, 'She stood in the sunshine,' an air that may compare favourably with the very best of this master's inspirations."—Brighton Guardian.

"L'ORPHELINE ET L'ANGE."

ROMANCE.

Composed by ALEXANDER REICHARDT.

SUNG BY MDLLE CARLOTTA PATTI.

A peine ai-je vu le printemps
Couvrir dix fois de leur feuillage
Les vieux saules de nos étangs,
Que, sans pitié pour mon jeune âge,
Dieu m'a ravi le guide aimé
Qui me prodiguait ses tendresses!
Je pleure son regard charmé!
Je ne reçois plus ses caresses!

Ainsi parlait, en gémissant,
Une orpheline désolée;
Mais un bel ange, l'embrassant,
Lui dit, d'une voix inspirée:
"Ne pleure plus et sois ma sœur
Ma mère sera notre mère,
Et tu verras que du bonheur
Il en est encor sur la terre!"

"A LOVER'S SONG."

A LOVER'S SONG. Composed expressly for, and sung by, Mr VERNON RIGBY. The Poetry by EDWARD COPPING. The Music by LOUIS DIEHL (Composer of "The Mariner," &c.). "Mr Vernon Rigby next reappeared, and sang 'A Lover's Song,' expressly composed for him by Louis Diehl. Both the words and music of the song are simple, and they received ample justice from the singer. An encore was demanded, and Mr Rigby repeated the last verse."—Birmingham Daily Post. "We must compliment Mr Rigby on his rendering of 'A Lover's Song.' "Mr Edward Lloyd gave the audience an unexpected degree of pleasure by his very admirable interpretation of Schubert's lovely 'Serenade,' and made scarcely less impression by his elegant delivery of Balfe's truly beautiful melody, set to words by Jessica Rankin, 'She stood in the sunshine,' an air that may compare favourably with the very best of this master's inspirations."—Brighton Guardian.

ROYAL ALBERT HALL CONCERTS.

The programme of the Popular Concert on Saturday night last presented the usual assortment of songs and ballads—most of them well known and all calculated to please the common ear. Madame Lemmens-Sherrington was in commission, her first song being one called the "Wren's nest," written by her husband, M. Lemmens, and which she made interesting, notwithstanding the somewhat dry quality of the music. "John Anderson, my jo," was her subsequent offering, and from the lips of our accomplished vocalist this famous Scotch song is always fresh and unfailing. Miss Antoinette Sterling, in whose excellent singing the public take so much natural delight, was in her accustomed place, and gave a new song, done for her, in the old ballad fashion, by Blumenthal, designated the "Lament of the border widow," which touched the sensibilities of the auditory as keenly as such simple ditties invariably do, when rendered with earnestness and feeling. In reply to the encore which followed, she gave Miss Macirone's pretty "Lullaby." Mr Barnby's lately-written song, "When the tide comes in," is another of those pathetic effusions to which Miss Antoinette Sterling is wont to give the utmost expression, and to look for an inevitable flat of repetition. Miss Annie Sinclair, who had previously given the "Jewel song" from Faust, descended presently to the humbler story of the "Bailiff's daughter of Islington," in which, as well as in "Robin Adair," she displayed much good taste as a singer of the household ballads of the olden school. Mr W. H. Cummings, always sure of a cordial welcome, was encored in Roeckel's sentimental song, "Only for thee," and again in a new song by Blumenthal, called "Yes," the graceful piquancy of which will no doubt bring it into domestic request. Mr Cummings was also announced to sing "Sally in our alley." Mr. Whitney is another of the Albert Hall favourites. His performances on the present occasion were an old German drinking song, "Down deep within the cellar," versified by John Oxenford; Barnby's "Bells of St Ethelred," and Balfe's air, "The heart bowed down"—a series well chosen to please an audience addicted to the lightest of vocal matters. The selected choristers of the Albert Hall were agreeably employed in the several part-songs set down for them. Among their best efforts were Pearsall's well-known madrigal, "Who shall win my lady fair," which they had to repeat, and a harmonised version of the "Blue Bells of Scotland." The singing of these vocalists is invariably neat and finished, and pleasant to hear. M. Wilhelmj is fast making a name in this country. Nothing more beautiful, each in its way, could have been heard than his respective deliveries of Ernst's passionate Elégie, and his own paraphrase of a Larghetto by Chopin. In the latter he was not only recalled, but encored. Mr Randegger accompanied most of the vocal music.

The scheme of the Classical concert on Tuesday evening contained some interesting features. There were, for instance, Auber's sparkling overture written for the opening of the International Exhibition of 1862—the only one of the special compositions that may be said to have survived the occasion; one of Paganini's eight violin concertos, Sterndale Bennett's ever charming Paradise and the Peri, and Schubert's unfinished symphony in B minor—"the mingled grandeur and loveliness of which," to quote the words of the accomplished writer of the notes in the official programme, "must ever provoke discontent at its fragmentary character." The delivery of these several works was everything that could be wished, and proclaimed emphatically the superior quality and discipline of Mr Barnby's large body of instrumentalists. The violin concerto afforded Herr Wilhelmj another opportunity of displaying—all that it was doubtless revived for—his masterly command over difficulties, the power of dealing with which Paganini probably fancied would have died with himself. But Paganini's mantle has been worn again and again, and by few more successfully than by Herr Wilhelmj. Abounding in bravura, passages not wanting at times in gracefulness of shape and motive, the interpretation of the concerto divulged Herr Wilhelmj's consummate ability in the most remarkable manner, and more than ever confirmed the excellent impression it has been his fortune to make upon the public mind. In the second part Herr Wilhelmj was heard in another and very different field of art, and raised a tumultuous and not easily quelled storm of approbation by his reading of Bach's Chaconne in D minor. In force, clearness, and accuracy of development, this performance was unquestionably one of the chief events of the evening. The new tenor, Herr Werrenrath, did himself honour by his delivery of Mendelssohn's lovely aria from St Paul, "Be thou faithful unto death." A tender, sympathetic voice, wholly devoid of the ordinary German hardness of quality, and used with refined taste, is his chief credential, and will probably win him favour. He was not quite so successful in his rendering of "Adelaida," which, though sung with abundant expression, lacked something of the power in the upper notes to which we are accustomed. Miss Antoinette Sterling gave a couple of Lieder by Beethoven, in her own effective manner, to the skilful accompaniment of Mr Willem Coenen.

CRYSTAL PALACE CONCERTS.

Yesterday's Saturday Concert at the Crystal Palace was signalized by the first appearance this season of the great violinist, Herr Joachim, whose appearance on the platform was the signal for rounds of enthusiastic cheering. His opening piece was Spohr's "Recitative, Adagio, and Allegro, for solo violin and orchestra (Concerto No. 6)," last performed at these concerts by Herr Straus, in November, 1873. Herr Joachim has never played better than in this Concerto yesterday. It is needless to say how magnificently he executed the most difficult violin passages, or how he played double scales and double octaves with apparent ease. The idea of difficulty, in fact, never disturbs his audience, and they are able to enter into the fullest enjoyment of the music he plays, without the slightest fear that elaborate intricacies may fail to be surmounted. His mastery of technique is not, however, by any means his highest merit. His playing is conspicuous for intellectuality. He seizes the intentions of his author, and makes them clear to his auditors by his admirable interpretation; and his phrasing might be advantageously studied by vocalists as well as violinists. No verbal description can convey an idea of the exquisite manner in which he played the Adagio of Spohr's Concerto. His second piece was a "Notturno in A," for solo violin, with accompaniment of violas, violoncelli, contrabassi, oboes, and horns (Op. 12), composed by himself. As a composition it hardly bore the contrast with Spohr's Concerto. The orchestration was effective, but there was an absence of sustained melody. A number of phrases followed each other without any apparent design, and the general effect was vague and unsatisfactory. Of course the deficiencies of the composer were partly compensated by the merits of the performer, and Herr Joachim played the Notturno exquisitely, receiving on this, as on the previous occasion, a hearty recall. The concert commenced with an orchestral "suite" of pieces in C, by J. S. Bach, very quaint and interesting, and concluded with Beethoven's No. 4 Symphony in B flat, which was faultlessly played by the fine band of the Palace. The vocal music was contributed by Miss Sophie Löwe and Mr Henry Guy, and Mr Manns was an able and zealous conductor.

Brussels.—The grand gala performance of Les Huguenots to celebrate the marriage of the Princess Louise was repeated the day after the nuptials for the benefit of the non-paying public, the theatre being thrown open gratuitously. The part of Valentine was entrusted to Madlle Ferucci, of the Grand Opera, Paris, who was especially engaged by M. Campocasso. The other principal parts were sustained by Madlle Hamaekers, MM. Echetto, Warot, and Devoyod. La Perle du Brésil is certainly not a success. A great deal of trouble expended in getting it up will, apparently, have been completely thrown away. It is to be hoped that La Reine de Chypre, still in preparation, will be mor successful.

Copenhagen.—After the performance at the Royal Opera of the operetta, Fruntimmerskolan—says the Berlingske Tidende—the Swedish singer, Mdlle Victoria Bunsen, appeared and gave three compositions by Rossini, Meyerbeer, and Donizetti. Mdlle Bunsen possesses more than ordinary vocal powers. With a powerful voice and an excellent school she has formed a contralto of rare sympathetic quality and great extension. In the air by Meyerbeer, and still more in the great air from Rossini's Cenerentola, the singer had an excellent opportunity to show her ability. The most difficult passages she sang with a correctness and pureness which electrified the audience, who greeted her with hearty applause. Finally, Mdlle Bunsen sang with great effect the Brindisi from Lucrezia Borgia.

BRIGHTON MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

(From an Occasional Correspondent.)

Brighton started its Festival in a sullen mood; perhaps it was unfortunate it had to commence the Lent season at the same time, for it was evident that it could not change its condition from grave to gay with the requisite rapidity. Everything seemed penitential. The lines of buildings from east to west were mournfully draped in mists, expressing thereby contrition for the many vanities practised in the drives and walks at their feet. The Marine Parade, apparently, was doomed to the severest penance; its houses perched upon the tall cliff looked as sulky as a row of big children put in disgrace upon the highest stool in a school. The sea likewise observed Lent in its own fashion. It hid its face from the sight of man, and moaned away from morn till night, and night till morn, in sullen cadences; instead of making sweet silvery music with its foamy fingers on the pebbles, rivalling thereby Æolus touching his harp strings, it threw the stones with harsh noise upon the beach, as if they were petrified tears of sulky rage. The sky also was very sad and grave. Fogs from the sea and fogs from the land were mixed and churned together by a cruel east wind, through which the church bells rolled as dismally as fog bells upon a rock-bound coast. Did the sirens ever visit these shores? If they did, they came and went with the swallows. Their visits, however, would scarcely be acceptable to Brighton matrons. Would they not go in deputation to the Mayor to seek his authority to prevent their descent upon the coast? For hear what their poet saith of them:—

> "Where the sirens dwell you plough the seas:
> Their song is death, and makes destruction please.
> Unblest the men whom music wins to stay
> Nigh the curst shore, and listen to the lay:
> No more that wretch shall view the joys of life,
> His blooming offspring, or his beauteous wife."

Such creatures are certainly not fit for a wife's quiet tea party. No! should they appear they must be driven away, for they would bring dismay and desolation to Brighton hearths and homes. There is a strange story circulating in the King's Road, that the fish have been driven away by the German bands, to the ruin of the fisherman's craft; and that the authorities send out, far into the deep sea, for fish, and keep them for a time in the Aquarium tanks to hear other music, and then cunningly drop them into the sea again, to report that the disease which made the fish sick had vanished. It is very desirable the fish should return, for do they not teach man wisdom! Is it not a well-known fact that the study, afforded by the Aquarium, of the calm ways of those creatures of cool blood, have taught bipeds of a hotter nature true philosophy and morality? Mr Kuhe, however, enticeth not fish; the musical baits he offers are those used by fishers of men, and what tempting and varied morsels he fastens to his many lines—every taste is accommodated with the richest and most cunningly adapted means for gratification. Bach's Passion for those who assume the severely classical, Handel's Messiah as an exercise for the robust musical Christian, and Haydn's Creation for those charmed by the purest flowers of melody. What a triumvirate, Bach, Handel, and Haydn! The three sirens of Greece—Parthénŏpe, Ligea, and Leucŏsia—were common street ballad singers compared to those mighty bards. A Beethoven symphony also is offered for those of the sublimest fancy—those who think the lute of Orpheus itself was but a poor dull thing in comparison with the majestic lyre of Beethoven, that Jupiter of music who rules the entire realms of sound, whose muse soars far up to the highest heavens, moves and expresses the passions which sway the breasts of mortals, and even snatches mysterious shadows from the realms of Hades.

Mr Kuhe bountifully patronises living composers. The oratorios: Naaman, by Costa, and St John the Baptist, by Macfarren, are in the programme; also the overtures: The Tempest, by Benedict, The Lay of the Last Minstrel, by Barnett, and Di Ballo, by Sullivan. The deceased masters, Mendelssohn, Schumann, and Schubert, together with Sterndale Bennett, the English master, now unanimously mourned by us, are represented. During the Festivals, twenty vocalists, headed by Sims Reeves, are announced to sing. A fine body of instrumentalists, led by M. Sainton, form a splendid orchestra; and the Brighton Sacred Harmonic Society, trained and directed by Mr R. Taylor, execute the choruses. It is a strange fact that no composition by Kuhe is in the scheme. What a remarkable act of self-denial! It deserves notice, if not imitation. The question is asked, "Why are all these attractions now offered, all these delicious baits hooked, when the big fish of Brighton are away; when the east wind empties the streets, and Lent fills the churches; when boards, with 'Lodgings to let' printed thereon, are seen in every part of the town as thick as blackberries in autumn fields, and the fashionable season is utterly dead and gone?" Most persons in their experience have enjoyed the hour when the principal guests have departed from the feast, and the host has taken them to some cozy room to partake of the delights of intimate friendship, and to revel in those pleasures which the dazzling crowd could not appreciate nor participate in. So, likewise, should Mr Kuhe's fellow-citizens value his efforts to afford them a noble entertainment when the fashionable and pleasure-seeking world has flown. He has kept his good wine until now, and freely offers it to his friendly patrons and neighbours.

The Festival commenced on Tuesday, the 9th instant, with a symphony by Papa Haydn. Mr Kuhe played in brilliant style Weber's Concert-stück, and M. Sainton rendered Mendelssohn's violin concerto with all the verve, brilliancy, taste and power that has ever distinguished his performances. A tribute of respect was paid to the memory of the late Sir Sterndale Bennett on the same occasion. On the Thursday following Bach's Passion music was performed for the first time in Brighton. The many perplexities and difficulties of this truly grand work were surmounted with more or less freedom. The choir achieved therein its greatest success; their conductor, Mr R. Taylor, led them nobly on to victory. Whether the oratorio was understood and appreciated by the audience could not be well ascertained, as they gave no audible signs of admiration. On Friday morning Benedict's overture The Tempest was the novelty of the concert. The appearance of the worthy knight on the platform was the signal for applause which increased tenfold at the termination of his fanciful work. He seemed to have realised the powers of a musical Prospero, calling forth at his will troops of fairies to sport hither and thither; and our old friend Caliban tumbled his clumsy carcase about at the master's command. The description of the storm was powerfully graphic. Beethoven's symphony in C minor was admirably rendered, and Schumann's concerto in A minor gave unqualified delight by its many beauties, its masterful treatment and highly poetic colouring; Mdlle Krebs played the pianoforte part superbly—with just perception and unerring skill. Sir Sterndale Bennett's overture commenced the concert, and more than ever convinced the listener that he was the foremost English composer of his day and generation. It was ably conducted by Mr F. Kingsbury, the indispensable and versatile coadjutor of Mr Kuhe at the conductor's desk. Naaman was given on Saturday morning, and drew to the Dome a large and enthusiastic audience. Whenever and wherever Sir Michael Costa conducts, a powerful, masterly, and refined performance is certain; and his remarkable gifts were doubly felt in his own oratorio. Naaman is a work that has undoubtedly added fame to its author. In it he has seized upon the characteristic form, tone, and colour of the story. To flowing melodies he has joined descriptive powers, and to skill in orchestration, fervency of thought, feeling, and utterance. The audience were delighted, and did not attempt to conceal their feelings. Last Monday was a popular night, and included Sullivan's characteristic and charming Overtura di Ballo. In Tuesday evening's programme, Barnett's Lay of the Last Minstrel formed a prominent number. The beauty of this composition places its author in the very front rank of our young English musicians. Wagner's overture to Tannhäuser was a feast for those fond of something "thick in the mouth." Mr Kuhe played Mendelssohn's Rondo in B minor with the most effective results. On Thursday night, Macfarren's St John the Baptist was produced, under the safe conduct of Sir Michael Costa. The author, in this work, has not only attained the height of his great argument, but has reached the summit of enduring fame. Its merits will live long after the plaudits of his generation are silent. This morning, Handel's Messiah will be performed. The Festival will conclude with Haydn's Creation on Monday next, avowedly given for the benefit of Mr Kuhe. The founder and sole manager of the Brighton Festival surely deserves hearty recognition for his efforts in the cause of music, and his courage in facing defeats and pecuniary loss year after year. The Festival will, nay is, become an established institution, and he can proudly say, "alone I did it." If he gains not riches thereby, he must assuredly secure the esteem, thanks, and praise of all true lovers of music, who may apply to him, in common with all who follow the art with singleness of purpose, the language of the poet of antiquity:—

"Unutterably blest
He whom the muses love. A melting voice
Flows ever from his lips: and is there one
Whose aching heart some sudden anguish wrings?
But lo! the bard, the muse's minister,
Awakes the strain; he sings the mighty deeds
Of men of yore; the praise of blessed gods
In heaven; and straight, though stricken to the soul,
He shall forget, nor aught of all his griefs
Remember * * * * * *."

Would that poems were negociable at bankers.

CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY.

The Council of the Senate has issued a report as to the Professorship of Music. Upon inquiry it appears that there is no deed of foundation and no endowment, the Professorship having been founded by a Grace of the Senate in 1684, but no stipend having been assigned. The duty of examining the exercises of Bachelors and Doctors of Music devolves upon the Professor. Lectures in Music have occasionally been given, but they do not appear to have been obligatory. In 1867 a recommendation was made and approved by the Senate that every facility should be given for the delivery of such lectures, and the expense in connexion therewith should be paid from the chest. In February, 1868, a stipend of £100 per annum was assigned to the late Sir W. Sterndale Bennett so long as he remained Professor. The mode of election on the last vacancy was more burgensium—that is, by the votes of the whole body of the members of the Senate—and at present no alteration is proposed. The Council recommend that a stipend of £200 be assigned to the next Professor so long as he holds office; that the new Professor be required to give a course of not less than four lectures in music annually in the University, the cost of illustrating these lectures, subject to the approval of the Vice-Chancellor, being defrayed from the chest; that the course be delivered gratis, and that the Professor be not authorised to charge any fees to candidates for degrees in music. The election of the Professor to be more burgensium. The Vice-Chancellor invites the attendance of members of the Senate to discuss these recommendations on Thursday, in the Art School, immediately after the congregation.

Mr G. A. Macfarren, the Principal of the Royal Academy of Music, has issued a circular to the members of the Senate, soliciting election to the vacant Professorship. He promises, if elected, not only to act as Examiner for Musical Degrees, but also to deliver lectures, such as he hopes might prove useful to resident musical students, and would endeavour, to the best of his power, to advance the study of music in the University.

ORGAN RECITAL.

The following is the programme of the fourth organ recital, by Mr W. T. Best, on Wednesday evening, 10th February, in the new Town Hall, Bolton, on the new grand organ built by Messrs Gray and Davison:—

Overture, Masaniello—Auber; Serenade, "When the moon is brightly shining"—Molique; Organ Sonata (No. 1, F minor), Allegro moderato, Adagio, Andante Recitando, Allegro assai vivace—Mendelssohn; Tema con Variazioni, for the Organ—J. Lemmens; Invitation pour la Valse—Weber; "Schiller-Festival" March—Meyerbeer.

The hall was very well attended, and the audience very attentive.

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

(From the "Hour.")

The concert of last Monday evening was associated with a programme presented as a tribute of respect to the talents of England's most distinguished composer, the late Sir Sterndale Bennett, and constituted the first artistic monument raised to his memory. The compositions which were performed have on many occasions bent the heads of listeners in acknowledgment of the genius which permeated them, and made voices eloquent in praise of the great musicianship which adorns them. But sorrow as well as admiration affected the audience of last evening, and eyes which used to glisten with delight while listening to the musical tales unfolded by our great English composer, were dimmed with tears as strain after strain appealed to the musical sense, and stirred the secret springs of mental emotion.

Applause grated harshly on the ear as the voice of one so dear to the musical profession and the whole musical world spoke in the sweet language of his art. Perfect silence would, doubtless, have best become the occasion, but it might have been misinterpreted, so the mode of expressing sympathy with a national bereavement found few objectors, and the sentiment which actuated the audience was regarded in the light of homage to a great name.

Criticism would be entirely out of place in the notice of this performance, even had it been open to it from a musical point of view. Happily, Mr Arthur Chappell, with his usual sound judgment and artistic perception brought to bear upon the work, presented some of the first talent of the day, and so made his highly-esteemed tribute one which it would be difficult to surpass.

One remark may, perhaps, be permitted in connection with this performance, which is, that those who doubted must have been convinced on Monday evening that some, if not all, of the works of Sir Sterndale Bennett are destined to survive the recollection of his personality. To a name so long honoured, and crowned with many highly-prized rewards, posterity, we are convinced, will not hesitate to affix its seal of renown, and Time, the touchstone of all that is true and noble, may be trusted to write in indelible letters the glorious word Immortal on works which almost point to inspiration.

Sterndale Bennett.

IN MEMORIAM.

Thou art gone! thou bright and beautiful star,
Thou art gone to thy heavenly rest,
To join in the music of saints above,
And lean on thy Saviour's breast.

No more shall we see thy welcoming smile,
Nor list to thy gentle voice;
Thy work on earth is but too soon o'er,
And now the angels rejoice.

But thy memory never shall fade from earth,
For the works thou hast left behind
Are gems, such as Britain is proud to own,
Bespeaking the master-mind.

They are tinged with sadness—can it be
That in youth thou wert called to part
With thy nearest on earth, thy parents dear,
Then—with two bosom friends of thine art?

Retiring thou wert, thy only fault
Was thine effort to bloom unseen,
But thy talents burst forth, and would not be hid,
Fit king to thine own "May Queen."

We mourn thee deeply, our hearts are sad,
That thy short course on earth is run;
But may He who hath called thee teach us to say,
"Not our will, but Thine be done."

THE CORONATION OF QUEEN VICTORIA.

AN ORCHESTRAL FOCUS.

(From "Journal and Jottings," by Henry W. Goodban.)

One of the grandest and most impressive events I have ever been a participator in was the coronation of Her Majesty at Westminster Abbey, June 28, 1838. I was then studying at the Royal Academy of Music, and had been there for about nine months. Four of the principal students on the male side, and four on the female side were engaged to attend the ceremony, as members of the State Band and Choir; and as I was the principal violoncellist, and a sub-professor at the time, I was one of the selected eight. When the letter arrived from Sir George Smart, the conductor, offering me the engagement, the glow of delight it gave me was of the rosiest tint, and delicious in its intensity; and, as it was accompanied with an order to go to a celebrated tailor, in St James's Street, to be measured for a handsome State uniform that was to be worn on the occasion, the notion of my first appearance in life in a cocked hat, a red coat trimmed with gold lace and purple velvet, coronation buttons, white kerseymere knee breeches, silk stockings, pumps and buckles, gave me such an amazing picture of myself in gay reality, and suggested a pardonable amount of vanity at that age, at the figure I should make in my imaginary magnificence; besides, to be one of the actors in such a scene of history was to have a recollection worth retaining for the rest of my life.

The evening previous to the day of the ceremony, I and one of my comrades sallied out to endeavour to engage two Hackney coaches, and found the jarveys appreciated the opportunity of raising their fares so cleverly that we could get nothing to convey us to the scene of action for less than a sovereign each—the usual fare for the distance being about two shillings. We engaged the coaches, and ordered the coachman to be at the Royal Academy of Music with them at six o'clock the next morning, as, according to our directions, we were to be at Westminster Abbey, in the orchestra, at eight.

We naturally arose at five, and did not want calling. We had promised to show ourselves in a certain part of the playground at 5.30, at the request of the young ladies on the other side of the house, who were desirous of contemplating us in our peacock's feathers, and could accomplish that object by rising unusually early, and appearing at their windows at the appointed time; and so much excitement did this inspection cause, that they were crowded by the envious damsels who were not going with us, certainly not in the most attractive condition of toilets—curl-papers and night-caps being a predominant feature in their head-dress—all having hurried from their somniferous repose, with their eyes scarcely in a condition to see clearly, none having adorned themselves in any way for general admiration, so dear to the fair sex. This "lever de rideaux" over, the sherry-flask and sandwich-box looked to (as we were advised that all the refreshment we should get would be what we brought), off we started for the Abbey, two gentlemen and two ladies in each coach, the ladies dressed in pure white muslin, made high up in the neck, without a ribbon or an ornament of any sort, either on their dress or in their hair—that being the order from the Lord Chamberlain's Office—which caused no end of vexation and annoyance, as it was such an effective extinguisher to their desire to show their taste, and exercise their attractive power in decorative effect.

Our prescribed route took us through Oxford Street, Hyde Park, to the Corner, down Constitution Hill to St James's Park, and a special entrance to the Abbey, where we arrived at about 7.30—the crowds of carriages, even at that time of the morning, making our journey a very slow one. On our way we were honoured by the constant salutes of the sentries, who, seeing our cocked hats and uniforms, thought they carried military distinction under them. As there was no opportunity of arguing the matter and convincing them that they were acting under an exaggerated impression of our importance, we accepted the compliment and returned the salutes, and put up with the unlooked-for attention with calm serenity.

When we walked into the Crypt, where the members of the State Band assembled, we found many of our comrades there, criticizing each other's appearance in so gorgeous and unusual a condition of costume, and amusing each other by their unrestrained personal remarks. Old Dragonetti had walked from his residence in Leicester Square, and had covered his silk stockings with a pair of black socks, that they might not get splashed; he wore a great coat over his uniform, and a skull cap of velvet, and looked a strange figure. His principal anxiety seemed to be in the care of his snuff-box which he carried in his hand, and to the contents of which he devoted himself to the enjoyment of continually. Lindley, the violoncellist, had preferred walking to being driven, and appeared in his great coat and without his cocked hat, which he left at home as a very unnecessary article of use in the matter of violoncello playing; and as he did not wear it, he said the street boys could not la-la-la-laugh at him; so his usual black beaver did duty. Watkins, the principal second violin, had padded his calves unequally; consequently one was bigger than the other; and Gratton Cooke, the hautboy player,—the wag of the profession at this time—seized a favourable opportunity to stick a pin into the one more fully developed, which the owner carried about with him in the most unfeeling manner, not at all understanding the chaffing he was subjected to. As the clock struck eight, we ascended the steps leading to the orchestra, which was erected in front of the organ-screen, with the instrument as a back-ground, and the House of Commons' gallery facing it, over the altar at the opposite end of the choir, where a blaze of decorative effect greeted our sight in the arrangement of the choir below, the pillars right and left, the seats for the expected company, the heraldic escutcheons and banners, the throne, the altar, etc., all glowing with gorgeous brightness and colour. As the guests arrived, and were shown to their places by the Earl Marshal's men, amongst whom I recognized my friend William Walmisley, the clerk of the journals of the House of Lords, our interest was constantly kept alive by the brilliancy of the ladies' toilets, the gems they wore, their own beauty, the splendid uniforms of the men, the State dresses of the officials, and the appearance of European celebrities of our own country, and from all the kingdoms that sent their ambassadors extraordinary to represent them, dressed in the court and national costumes of the countries they represented.

As they walked up the choir their personal popularity was tested by the reception they met with from the assembled company. When the Duke of Wellington appeared, the clapping of hands was very enthusiastic, and was only equalled when Marshal Soult, attended by his suite, presented himself. The two great warriors shook hands most cordially when they met each other, and it was reported that the Duke reminded the Marshal that he had been endeavouring to catch him all the time they were commanding opposing armies, and had always failed, and at last, on this peaceful occasion, he had succeeded. There was one of the handsomest men I ever saw belonging to the Greek Embassy, dressed in the picturesque costume of the country he represented, who received a flattering ovation, but I could not ascertain who he was. Thus occupied and amused, the time until eleven o'clock passed so quickly, with the constant interest that was sustained until that hour by the unceasing arrivals, and the excitement that was caused by the guests' endeavours to find and settle themselves in their appointed places, that when the booming of the guns in St James's Park announced the departure of the Queen and her cortége from Buckingham Palace on her way to Westminster Abbey, and the less reverberating tap of Sir George Smart's bâton on his desk gave the signal for us to settle ourselves in our places, we found three hours had passed so quickly that we were quite unconscious of the time that had elapsed.

At 11.30 Her Majesty, attended by the officers of State and the ladies of her court, arrived at the principal entrance. The procession was formed and preceded by the kings at arms, the heralds and State trumpeters, in their golden uniforms and velvet caps, blowing a triumphant blast from their silver trumpets, amidst the enthusiastic plaudits of her loyal subjects assembled to greet and do honour to her on the occasion. The Duchess of Sutherland, as a peeress and mistress of the robes, wearing her crimson velvet train, bordered with golden strawberry leaves and lined with ermine, held by two handsome pages, with a third carrying her coronet on a velvet cushion, was a splendid illustration of true English beauty. She eclipsed all the rest of the suite, and was, indeed, "a loadstone to all hearts, and a load-star to all eyes." When the Queen mounted the raised throne facing the altar and the House of Commons' gallery, with the peers in their robes on the right hand, upon rows of seats ascending towards the windows on the side of Poets' corner, headed by the Dukes of Sussex and Cambridge, and on her left by peeresses arranged in the same way, the burst of loyal enthusiasm as her youthful Majesty assumed her position as the head of the nation was positively enthralling.

MUSIC IN MANCHESTER.

(From our Correspondent.)

A considerable number of interesting concerts have been given here since I last wrote, but I need only refer to the more attractive of them. Beethoven's mighty Choral Symphony was given at Mr Hallé's concert the week before last, and, though the work has been frequently heard here, it created an unmistakable sensation. The performance was remarkably fine, and all who were engaged in it might claim a share of the applause, which was freely given. Unquestionably, the Ninth Symphony has at last secured a firm place in the favour of our local amateurs, and not a few who some years ago confessed their inability to understand it were in ecstacies on this occasion. The vocal solos were very well sung by Mdme Otto Alvsleben, Miss Thorley, Mr Vernon Rigby, and Mr Santley. At the same concert, a picturesque setting of Tennyson's "Charge of the Light Brigade," for full choir with orchestral accompaniments, by Mr Ed. Hecht, was also produced. It is the work of a musician, and was admirably sung and very cordially received. For last week's concert Mr Hallé had secured the services of Herr Joachim, who played Spohr's E minor Concerto—how, I will not attempt to say, for the best of all reasons—and, for the first time, a Notturno of his own, a composition of wondrous beauty, and scored for the orchestra with great skill. Mr Hallé played a Bach selection with perfect finish and refinement, and the singing of Mdme Nouver, a local artist, was not unworthy of this admirable concert. The symphony of the evening was Beethoven's No. 2, which, like the other orchestral selections, was splendidly played by Mr Hallé's magnificent band. The programme for this week's concert is also very attractive:—

Grand Symphony, in G minor, Op. 45 (first time)—Sterndale Bennett; Recit. and Air, "War sag ich," Op. 56 (Mdlle Sophie Löwe)—Weber; Grand Concerto, in D (violin, Herr Joachim)—Beethoven; "Evening," Rhapsodie, in E flat (first time)—Raff; Concerto for two violins, in D minor (Madame Norman-Néruda and Herr Joachim)—S. Bach; Air, "Lorsque mon maître est en voyage" (Jean de Paris) (Mdlle Sophie Löwe)—Boieldieu; Solo Pianoforte, in E and D, "Noveletten" (first time) (Mr Charles Hallé)—Schumann; Duet, two violins, Adagio and Finale (from duet in D major) (Madame Norman-Néruda and Herr Joachim)—Spohr; Overture, Le Nozze di Figaro—Mozart.

This will not be the first time that Madame Néruda and Herr Joachim have played together in Manchester; the previous occasion being the concert given last year, by Herr Joachim and Mr Hallé, for the benefit of the Bach Monument Fund. You will also see with interest that we are to hear, for the first time, the G minor symphony of the lamented composer, whose career, character, and services have been so appropriately and so gracefully described in your columns.

Mr De Jong's last subscription concert was given on Saturday evening, when Mr Mapleson's concert party again appeared. With the names of Tietjens and Trebelli on the programme, a crowded house was a matter of course, and one of the largest audiences of the season greeted them. On Saturday next an extra benefit concert will be given by Mr De Jong, for which several eminent artists have promised their services.

February 17, 1875.

BAIREUTH.—The band of the Grand-National-Festival-Stage-Play-Theatre will consist of some 150 performers, namely: 16 first, and 16 second, violins; 10 tenors; 12 violoncellos; 7 harps; 5 flutes oboes, and clarinets; 2 English horns; 2 ophicleides; 16 horns; 8 trumpets; as many trombones and tubas, and 6 pairs of cymbals. This body of instrumentalists will represent the pick of the executants of Germany, the best artists from Brunswick, Dessau, Coburg, Meinigen, Weimar, Berlin, Hanover, Leipsic, and many other places, having promised their services.

WILLIAM STERNDALE BENNETT.

(From the "Globe," Feb. 8th.)

William Sterndale Bennett was consigned to the last home reserved for the greatest and best of England's children on Saturday. For nearly two centuries our beautiful and venerated Abbey has gathered to its bosom no such representative of the art he practised. Nor could it have done so. Henry Purcell and Sterndale Bennett are as yet our representative musicians. Not that proofs of scholarship and even genius are wanting in the works of English composers who have lived and died between the years 1695 and 1875, but that their influence on the great mass of those who speak the universal language has been but local, and their very names are unknown out of their own country. Differing as widely as any two practitioners of an art whose processes and even aims have been in a continual state of transition since it has been one, and whose careers have been separated by so long an interval of time, there is much in common with the two men, even in their external history. They were both nurtured in, and they both owed their first impressions to, those time-honoured conservatories of music, our cathedral or choral schools; they both manifested and cultivated their precious gifts early; but, more than all, they both exhibited genius so individual that no competent reader or hearer could ever fail to assign from internal evidence any one of their works to its right owner. Here the parallel must end. The productions of a musician trained and finishing his course in the seventeenth century were inevitably as inferior to, as they were different from, those of a musician of the nineteenth. A Bennett could no more have existed in the seventeenth century than a Raphael in the fourteenth. The age of Purcell was everywhere—and especially in England—an age of transition. Everywhere the tonality, and with it the influence, of the old masters who worked in it was getting out of date, and a new art taking the place of the old; while in England political causes had interrupted for an entire generation before Purcell's time, not only the progress, but even the maintenance of the art in its former condition. But it it is chiefly in one particular that the difference between Purcell's epoch and our own is most strikingly manifested. In the former music was little more than the handmaid of another art; it had scarcely an existence apart from poetry; in the latter it has rendered itself entirely independent and individual, and in doing so exhibited powers and resources unconceived, perhaps inconceivable, by its earlier practitioners. It is through the agency of music, pure and simple, often without even the stimulus of any particular sentiment or idea, always without the interpretation or point that would be given to any such sentiment or idea by verse, or even prose, that the composer of the nineteenth century must take rank among this order. He must speak, if he would speak to the universe, in the universal language—the language of unarticulated sounds. Those who have proved themselves masters of this language, and have shown that they have something to say in it which concerns and interests humanity, constitute as yet a small company. Six—at the utmost seven—are all the representatives of the symphonic school that the world has as yet accepted, and they are all natives of Germany. To these must now be added another in Sterndale Bennett. What place among them posterity will assign to him it would be rash to anticipate. How far a deficiency in force may be counterbalanced, to those who follow us, by invention, refinement, grace, and beauty of detail, always subordinate to proportion, time will show. That he will take his place, and that not the lowest, "tra cotanto senno," we hold to be certain.

PESTH.—Should no unforseen obstacle occur to prevent it, the grand Wagner Concert will be given here on the 21st February. The Composer of the Future will himself perform "Wotans Feuerzauber" from the Walküre, and the "Tod" from the Götterdämmerung, the last work in the Nibelungen-Tetralogie. He will also conduct the other works performed, except Franz Liszt's new composition, Die Glocken von Strassburg, for solo, mixed chorus, and orchestra, which the Abbate will conduct personally.

The Musical World,

LONDON, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 20, 1875.

WE are sorry to learn that matters do not progress smoothly at the Royal Academy of Music, in connection with the appointment of Mr G. A. Macfarren as Principal of that establishment. The dispute is based, as we are informed, upon the correct interpretation of those clauses in the Charter which provide for the choice of Principal. Into the legal bearings of the case we do not propose to enter, the less because our hope is that the question of what may or may not be legal will soon disappear; and, indeed, we refer to the matter at all simply to counsel the moderation which cannot fail to set things right. It appears that the Committee of Management, having to fill the vacancy caused by Sir Sterndale Bennett's death, and being under the necessity of doing so without delay, appointed Mr Macfarren in the absence of the President, Lord Dudley, who first learned their decision through the public journals. Upon this part of the case it is not difficult to offer an opinion. The Charter may sustain the action of the Committee; but even if that body had the fullest right to make an election without consulting the President, the exercise of its right amounted to a grave act of discourtesy. The Royal Academy may have a President who does not assume presidential functions, but simply plays the part of an ornamental figure-head. Whether this be so or not, we do not know, nor does it matter. Enough that Lord Dudley should have had a voice in the election of Principal; or, at least, should have been informed that an election was about to take place, and his presence as chairman requested. Naturally, Lord Dudley felt annoyed, not so much at what had been done, as that it had been done behind his back; and he at once communicated with the Committee, questioning the legality of Mr Macfarren's appointment, and declining to recognize him as Principal of the Academy. In this emergency the Committee did a sensible thing. After electing Mr Macfarren in such a manner, they might have been expected to defy their President; instead of which a conciliatory letter of explanation was sent to the offended nobleman, and at this point the matter now rests. We trust peace will soon be made. The Committee must recognize and acknowledge the fact of having done, inadvertently no doubt, an uncivil thing. Furthermore, if it be demanded, they should be prepared to cancel the election and re-appoint Mr Macfarren with all proper observance, we will not say of the terms of the Charter, but of etiquette and propriety. The amende honorable thus made, Earl Dudley can have no difficulty in forgetting the matter. The rights of his position will have been asserted, and we may suppose that for those rights, rather than for any personal considerations, he is jealous. A moral easily springs out of this contretemps,—one which counsels deliberation in the performance of important acts, and a careful regard for all that those acts may affect. Had it occurred to a single member of the Committee that the Academy boasted a noble President, and that his place was at their head, we should have heard nothing of the present difficulty.

Mr Macfarren, of course, stands apart from the embroglio, with which he had nothing to do. Nobody calls his claim in question, and no doubt exists that, if a new election were made in strict form, he would be unanimously chosen. Let us hope that matters will not proceed so far—that Lord Dudley having received the explanations of the Committee, will recognize as Principal the man who, of all others, is best fitted for the place.

WHEN public opinion demands that an eminent man's remains shall be buried with solemn state, it is only fair that the burden of expense should be lifted from the shoulders of his family. We are happy to know that the obligation is recognized in the case of the late Sir Sterndale Bennett. Three of the institutions with which our departed master was associated in life—viz., the Philharmonic Society, the Royal Society of Musicians, and the Royal Academy of Music—sent their representatives to a conference some days ago, at which it was resolved that the cost of the funeral should be jointly borne, each society paying a certain proportion. The arrangement, we understand, must be submitted, as far as concerns the Royal Society of Musicians, to a general meeting of that body; but as the opposition to it, if any, can only be insignificant, we may regard the matter as finally settled in a way that reflects the utmost honour upon those concerned.

OCCASIONAL NOTES.

Galignani states that several travellers of various countries have called at its office, complaining of the extortionate sums they have been asked to pay for places in the new Opera House at Paris. When they applied at the theatre, they were told that every seat was taken, but that perhaps the agents might be able to supply them. These last had some places disposable, but at prices not much inferior to double the regular charge; and the complainants now inquire if some remedy cannot be devised for such an abuse. No hope is held out of redress.

It is the intention of the directors to devote the programme of a future concert at the Crystal Palace to the works of Sterndale Bennett.

People often ask: Who is the composer of the celebrated Hungarian "Rakoczy March," which Berlioz introduced so effectively in La Damnation de Faust? According to a Hungarian journal, Franz Rakoczy II., the hero of the war of Magyar independence, returning on the 10th November, 1705, from the battle-field of Szibo, first heard it played by a certain Barna Miska, who, in honour of the gallant soldier, called it after him. A descendant of the composer's made it generally known by playing it wherever he went. At Stuhlweissenburg, he performed it before the Abbate Vacek, who introduced it to the notice of the composer, Ruzsicska. The latter cast it in a more perfect musical form. From that period, innumerable variations have been, and still continue to be, added to it.

Our American contemporary, the Philharmonic Journal, has taken to "high falutin," and does it well. Here is a specimen:—

"The Kellogg English Opera Troupe, now performing at the Academy of Music, is probably, with the exception of the late Parepa-Rosa company, the finest organization of the kind ever heard in America. There is no use in minding the truth. When we Americans 'give our mind' to anything, there is little doubt of our ultimate success. The greatest prime donne of the world, to-day, are Americans. Patti, Miss Harris, Albani, Miss Kellogg, and Minnie Hauck. Miss Nilsson is second to Patti, Lucca is older than Kellogg, and Titesjiens (sic) is quite passe (sic). The finest contralti are Americans, namely, Miss Philips, Miss Cary, and Miss Sterling. Few tenors are equal to our Geo. Simpson, Wm Castle, and Wm Leggat; while Sig. Foli (nee—sic—Foley) and Wm Perkins, both Americans, are now estimated abroad as the two finest bassi on the stage, not excepting Santley and Faure, both of whom are little worn now."

We will not dispute our contemporary's assertion, but perhaps it would be as well if he "gave his mind" to orthography. Being an American, there would be "little doubt of his ultimate success."

Hamburg.—Herr Link, from the Royal Operahouse, Berlin, has been singing at the Stadttheater in various operas, including Il Trovatore, Guillaume Tell, and Lucrezia Borgia. Le Prophète, with Madlle Borée as Fides, will be produced about the end of the month.

Leipsic.—Mad. Pauline Lucca has appeared at the Stadttheater as Frau Fluth (Mrs Ford) in Nicolai's Lustige Weiber von Windsor. Though the prices of admission were doubled, every place in the house was occupied. The lady's terms are said to have been 3,000 marks for the evening.

CONCERTS VARIOUS.

The third of Mr Charles Fletcher's quartet concerts (an esteemed correspondent informs us), was given at Crescent House, South Kensington, last week. Haydn's Quartet in G major (No. 81, Op. 77), and a Quintet (Op. 44), by Schumann, were the concerted pieces. Madame Fletcher played Liszt's "Tarentelle" on the pianoforte, and her husband the Andante and Presto from Mendelssohn's violin concerto. Miss Purdy was the vocalist. She sang "Ah! se tu dormi," and the "Lullaby," by Brahms. The latter was, with unaccustomed energy for a drawing-room audience, re-demanded.

A highly successful amateur concert was given, on the 4th inst., in the Horns Assembly Rooms, Kennington, by the Victoria Works Band (Powis, James, Western & Co., engineers), who, considering they have been formed only a little over a year, acquitted themselves exceedingly well, and reflected much credit on their bandmaster, Mr Davy. The amateur ladies and gentlemen who assisted them, nearly all of whom were in some way connected with the works, gave their songs in excellent style. Chiefly noticeable was Mr G. Hatch's rendering of Sullivan's "Golden Days"; Miss Lillie Jones and Miss Sharland's duet, "The Flower Gatherers"; Miss Chalis', "Esmeralda" (Levey); Mr Manfred Bale's "Mandolinata" and "You'll remember me"; and Mr Moore's "O'er the dark and stormy ocean" (Glover). Miss Wilson's pianoforte playing was appreciated by the audience, and Miss Hamilton won applause for her excellent rendering of Favarger's "Oberon.' Mr W. F. Taylor, who was the musical director, contributed Schubert's "Carneval de Venise," which was re-demanded, but not acceded to; and afterwards played, with his pupil, Miss Hamilton, his Grand Duo on Airs from Geneviève de Brabant. The room was crowded to excess, and we hope the Band Fund will be substantially benefited thereby.

M. Alexandre Billet's Recitals.—The second of the series of M. Alexandre Billet's pianoforte recitals was given on Wednesday morning, before an audience that filled nearly every seat in St George's Hall. Among the selection of pieces which the distinguished Franco-Prussian professor performed, the specially noticeable features were Beethoven's Trio (Op. 1, No. 3) in C minor, in which Mr Henry Holmes and M. Paque were his adequate collaborateurs, and Mendelssohn's Variations in D major (Op. 17), for pianoforte and violoncello, in which the last-named gentleman rendered valuable service. The qualities which M. Billet possesses as a pianist have been so often praised, that no fresh eulogium is needed. Miss Estelle Emrick, whose voice and style we have often had occasion to notice, was the vocalist. She delivered Gumbert's pretty song, "The Tear," to the satisfaction of the audience, whilst she was encored in Braga's "Serenata" (violoncello obbligato, M. Paque). M. Billet's solo pieces were Beethoven's Sonata in C minor (Op. 111), the faithful rendering of which deserves a special word of praise, Scarlatti's Fugue in F minor, Nos. 3 and 4 of Mendelssohn's Characteristic Pieces (Op. 7), Field's Notturno in E flat, and Weber's Momento Capriccioso in B flat (Op. 12). Herr Lehmeyer accompanied the vocal music.—Sigmund Menkes.

The Guild of St Mark's, president the Rev. J. Erskine Clarke, M.A. (Vicar of Battersea), vice-presidents Philip Cazenove, Esq., Rev. H. B. Verdon, B.A., and the Rev. S. G. Scott, M.A., gave an evening concert on the 8th instant, in St Mark's Schoolroom, Battersea, under the directorship of Mr W. F. Taylor, assisted by Miss Webb, R. A. M., Miss Emma Webb, Miss Attew, Miss Hamilton, Miss Hardy (violin), Messrs McDonald, Baker, etc. The concert opened with Herz's grand pianoforte duet on the March in Guillaume Tell, which was admirably played by Mr Taylor and his pupil, Miss Hamilton. Miss Webb followed with "Robin Adair," and would have repeated it, but the vice-president wisely prohibited "encores." Miss Webb also joined her sister, Miss Emma Webb, in a duet by Mendelssohn, "Wert thou in the cauld blast?" which was sung charmingly. Miss Emma Webb also gave, in capital style, Horn's "Cherry Ripe." The Misses Attew were also very successful in their songs and duets. Mr Baker sang "The village blacksmith" and "I am a friar of Orders Grey;" Mr J. B. McDonald, "As I'd nothing else to do" (Hatton); and an amateur quartet party sang a four-part song excellently. Miss Hardy, a very youthful artist, showed great finish in her violin solo on airs from Lucia, and gives promise of future excellence. Miss Hamilton's playing was highly appreciated, and Mr W. F. Taylor's performance of his grand Polonaise de Concert, "Wladislaws," much admired. The room was crowded; during intervals in the course of the concert, two instructive and amusing readings were introduced by P. Cazenove, Esq., and the Rev. S. G. Scott; and this highly successful evening's entertainment was brought to a close by a spirited performance (by Miss Hamilton and Mr W. F. Taylor) of the overture to Zampa, as a pianoforte duet, and the National Anthem.

We hear on good authority that the foundation stone of Mr Mapleson's new opera-house will be laid by the Prince of Wales.

We have reason to believe that Sig. Arditi is engaged to conduct the next series of Promenade Concerts at Covent Garden Theatre.

Flocks and Herds.

TREATMENT OF ANIMALS.

(From "Another World.")

"Why are the poor hungry?—Why do not your flocks and herds multiply and increase?—Why do you maltreat the sire and kill the mother of many progenies?"

"Obey my laws, and your flocks will equal in number the drops of water in the great Cataract, which, ever flowing, ever merging in the mighty Ocean, is constantly supplied with new increase for the refreshment and delight of Montalluyah."

Slaughtering Animals.

In killing animals for food all painful processes are avoided. Under the old system the cruelty with which the animal was treated, and its suffering from the violence of the death-struggle greatly effected the quality of the meat, lessened its nutritive powers, and rendered it less digestible, and very often exciting and injurious. Now, when an animal is to be killed, it is placed in a large lighted stable, over which is a loft, communicating with it by means of a grating. In this a man is stationed, who thrusts through the grating, a long stick, baited with a bunch of fresh grass, in the middle of which is contained a small globule endued with the property of depriving the animal of all consciousness and sense of feeling. As soon as the beast has eaten the grass, and consequently swallowed the pill, he staggers and falls; and, before he has time to recover, the butcher despatches him by cutting his throat and letting out the blood, whereupon he dies a painless death, without a struggle. Only one animal is despatched at a time in the same stable, so that one does not see another killed. There is reason for this precaution.

A lamb takes the ball of grass from the hand, for it is thus our shepherds sometimes feed them. Poultry are killed by very small quantities of the preparation being mixed with their grain; the fowls sometimes take up two or three grains not impregnated with the material, but as soon as the smallest particle is swallowed they stagger and fall. It is interesting to see this, the effect is so instantaneous. The ingredient used does not in any way injure the meat and is indeed considered beneficial, even to the human system, when administered in small quantities, since the torpor it causes at the moment is succeeded by increased vitality and strength.

The Blood of Animals.

When the animal is killed we are very scrupulous in pouring out the blood, which we avoid using for any purpose connected with food. On every occasion of the kind "field doctors" are present to see that all due precautions are taken. They analyse the blood, and, if it does not contain the proper ingredients, the animal is looked upon as diseased, and its flesh rejected as so far unwholesome; in our climate it would be difficult of digestion, and produce heaviness, disinclination to study, despondency, and other inconveniences. Blood is said to contain the electricity that, in connection with the electricity on the nerves, gives action, feeling, pleasure, and pain. Blood, indeed, contains as it were the material through which the life of the animal carries on its operations.

Protection of the Meat from Insects.

The animal as soon as killed is cut up into different portions, each of which is placed for a few minutes in a large vessel containing an infusion of a certain herb, to which flies and winged insects of all kinds have a great antipathy. The steeping of the meat into this preparation effectually protects it against their approach. There are immense numbers of winged insects in our climate, but none will approach food which has been steeped in an effusion of this herb. By these and other precautions they are kept within certain limits and driven to the uses for which nature intended them. It is not necessary to keep the meat in the vessel for more than a few minutes, nor does the liquid deteriorate the quality or taste of the meat. Far from being noxious to the human race, the herb, which is free from smell, contains a healthy bitter, is cooling and refreshing, and cleanses and preserves the pores of the skin.

Formerly numbers of persons were effected by the deposits, which, left by flies on meats and provisions generally, caused irritation of the bowels, diarrhœa, and vomit, and were other wise very injurious to the system.

I may here mention that a preparation of the herb to which I have referred is used for fruits and provisions generally, which are protected by a light gauze steeped in an infusion of the herb and thrown loosely over them; though, indeed, it is only necessary to place the gauze at the side of the provisions to prevent the approach of the enemy.

This infusion is also used in our houses, and during repasts; couches, bedding, and coverings are sprinkled with the liquid. A preparation is also used for the toilette, in order to protect the head and face from the flies.

Cruelty to Animals.

Cruelty to an animal, even when not intended for food, entails so much disgrace that it is an offence of the rarest occurrence. My laws provide various punishments according to the grade of the offender and the nature of the offence.

If a common man were really cruel to his horse he would be compelled to draw his merchandise by hand. If the offence were committed by a man of high position the punishment would be more severe, and not only would he be treated as though he were unworthy of exercising power over good animals and consequently deprived of all his horses, but he would be supplied with a vicious horse, which, perhaps, he would be obliged to ride along a dangerous path, that he might thus be made to appreciate the superior gentleness of the one he had maltreated. If the offence were repeated, he would be degraded from his position or condemned during a certain period to wear "the dress of shame."

Milan.—The public is still expecting the first representation, at the Scala, of Sig. Marchetti's new opera, Gustavo Wasa, which has been put off so often that every one's patience is pretty well exhausted. There is a report that, for some unknown reason or other, Sig. Pallerini has withdrawn his ballet of Semiramide.—Il Guarany, by Sig. Gomez, is in rehearsal at the Caroano.

Turin.—In consequence of Sig ora Vercolina's having cancelled her engagement, Sig. Pisani's new opera, Gitana, has been withdrawn, at least temporarily, as the part intended for the fair seceder is not adapted to Signora Bedetti, who replaces her. Sig. Gomez has arrived to superintend the rehearsals of Salvator Rosa, which is cast as follows:—Isabella, Signora Singer; Salvatore, Sig. Patierno; Gennariello, Signora Cavedani; Masaniello, Sig. Moriani; and the Duca d'Arcos, Sig. Barberat.

Stockholm.—The Dagens nyheter (Daily News) says that Mdlle Victoria Bunsen, who has been singing at the Operahouse, is one of those young and talented artists whose country is Europe. There is a long and difficult way before one arrives at the point where art unveils her Isis face, and gives to her worshippers her hidden treasures. In one word, when that point is arrived at, you become an artist. Mdlle Bunsen is an artist! A singer can be an artist with small means, but Mdlle Bunsen has the advantage of a fine voice, a full, pure, and extensive contralto, of which the lowest and highest notes are comparatively the best. The middle notes are of good quality, but are not so powerful. Mdlle Bunsen's execution and declamation are perfect, and her style of singing excellent. Mdlle Bunsen sang an aria by Mercadante, and one by Rossini. On being recalled after the first, and "encored" after the second, she gave, with extraordinary dash and brilliancy, the Brindisi from Lucrezia Borgia. Mdlle Bunsen's success was complete.

PROVINCIAL.

TERLING (ESSEX).—An evening concert was given on Monday, under the patronage of Lord Rayleigh and General Hill, &c., in the School Room of Terling, which attracted a full and apreciative audience. The Terling Choral Society, under the direction of the Hon. Richard Strutt, gave part-songs and glees by Attwood, Ford, Bishop, &c., with effect, and were encored in several; Miss Jessie Stocken gave some popular songs; Messrs J. Smith, Robert Gill, and J. B. Bolton, were also much applauded for their vocal contributions. Mr Bolton, who possesses a good and effective baritone voice, sang "Polly," was encored, and received the same compliment in conjunction with Mr J. Smith, in Tom Cooke's "Love and War." Miss Clara Lewis presided at the pianoforte, and also performed, with decided effect, a pianoforte duet with the Hon. R. Strutt.—Terling Paper.

BRIGHTON.—Mr Kuhe's Festival has occupied the musical public this last fortnight, and has been quite the "rage." Notwithstanding its attraction, however, the Aquarium Concerts have been well attended. Mr Levy and Mr T. Harper have been the instrumental, and Madame Osborne Williams, Miss Minnie Curtis and Mr George Perren, the vocal attractions. At to-day's concert the Duke of York's boys' band, from the Military Asylum, Chelsea, under the direction of the bandmaster, Mr C. Thomas, will perform.—Madame Otto-Alvsleben, by the bye, has gained the approbation of the visitors to Mr Kuhe's Festival as well as of the critics. A local journal, in its remarks on a recent performance, says that Madame Alvsleben sings with a fidelity and truthfulness that prove her to be a conscientious as well as a carefully trained artist. Applause came to her in due proportion, and certainly she deserved all she obtained, and more.

SHEFFIELD.—A concert on a grand scale, well patronised, was given in the Town Hall. Some of the performers were, we believe, new to the district. Miss José Sherrington has an excellent voice, and her rendering of Handel's "Angels ever bright and fair" was delightful. One feature was specially noteworthy,—the splendid character of her diminuendo, the like of which we have not listened to for many years. Her shake also is good, and she was deservedly recalled. Miss Sherrington also sang "The Shadow Song" from Dinorah in exquisite style, and was under the necessity of repeating the latter part. Madame Poole sang "Never parted" and the "Maiden's Rose." Madame Varley-Liebe, an enchanting violinist, evoked a perfect storm of applause; and Mr Varley the tenor sang "My sweetheart when a boy" and "Sound an Alarm;" Mr Wadmore sang "To Anthea" well; and, of the miscellaneous items, the best was the charming trio, "The Magic Wove Scarf," from The Mountain Sylph, prettily rendered by Miss José Sherrington, Mr Varley, and Mr Wadmore.—Sheffield Paper.

DONCASTER.—Mr Eyre gave his annual concert at the Guild-hall. In order to afford the inhabitants in the district an opportunity of being present, Mr Eyre had two performances, one in the afternoon and one in the evening. The vocalists included Madame Thaddeus Wells, Miss Sara Smith, a pupil of Mr Eyre; Mr T. Wright, the noted tenor from Bradford; and Mr Eyre. The principal instrumentalist was Mr Henry Nicholson, solo flautist. Of Madame Wells, either as a singer or an instrumentalist, one can scarcely speak in too high terms. To a rich and flexible soprano voice she adds excellent taste and a charming manner, and sings with a sweetness, feeling, and precision, that it would be almost impossible to excel. As a pianist, too, this lady is no mean performer. Her accompaniments to Mr Nicholson well merited the applause she received. Miss Smith made her first public appearance before a Doncaster audience on the occasion. She has a fine pure voice of a more than moderate compass and a pleasing style, and she gives proofs of careful and diligent training. Mr Booth made a very able accompanist of the vocal music.—Doncaster Paper.

BRENTWOOD (Essex)—Mr Henry Morley, of the Royal Academy of Music, London, gave a vocal and instrumental concert on Thursday evening, February 11, in the Town Hall, with Miss Banks, Miss Lina Glover, and Mr Albert James as vocalists; Miss Morley (pianoforte) and the bénéficiaire himself (violin), as instrumentalists. Miss Emilie Glover, the accomplished harpist (daughter of Professor Glover, of Dublin), was also announced to "assist," but was unfortunately prevented by indisposition. There was, notwithstanding the inclement weather, a good attendance. The performance by Miss Morley and Mr Morley of fantasias for violin and piano on airs from Lucia di Lammermoor, and from Adolph Adams' Si j'etais Roi, were heard with great pleasure by the audience, who also expressed their approbation of the vocal pieces, sung by the artists we have named above. Ascher's charming romance, "Alice, where art thou?" sung by Mr A. James; M. Gounod's Berceuse (violin obbligato, Mr Morley), sung by Miss Banks; and "The Harp that once through Tara's hall," sung, con amore, by Miss Lina Glover, were all greatly admired; and Mr Morley deserves to be highly praised for the charming entertainment he provided for his patrons.

STIRLING AND PAISLEY.—Mr Henry Webb has just concluded a very successful concert tour. His party consisted of Mesdames José Sherrington, Poole, Varley-Liebé (violin); Messrs Nelson Varley, Wadmore, and Malcolm (pianoforte). The towns visited have been Yeovil, Devizes, Wednesbury, Buralem, Burton-on-Trent, Southport, Bathgate, Stirling, Paisley, Airdrie, and Whitehaven. The miscellaneous concerts were of a very attractive character, and were attended by large audiences. At Stirling and Paisley The Messiah and St John the Baptist were given Handel's masterpiece was given for the first time in Stirling, and received a magnificent rendering by all concerned. The recently resuscitated Choral Society (under the conductorship of Mr C. E. Allum) gave the choruses in an unexceptionable manner, and the Glasgow Resident Orchestra, under the leadership of Mr J. T. Carrodus, was a host in itself. The large hall of the Smith Institute was filled to overflowing with a brilliant assembly. The Paisley Musical Association are congratulated on selecting Macfarren's St John the Baptist for one of their series of concerts, as it attracted an immense audience. The soloists did full justice to the work, and, with a well-trained chorus and band (leader, Mr Carrodus), under the directorship of Mr Lorimer, the performance was very satisfactory. Altogether, the tour has been successful from every point of view. The same party will leave London again on March 24th, to fulfil several provincial engagements.

TEIGNMOUTH.—On Friday, the 29th of January, at the New Assembly Rooms, the Schubert Society (President, Sir Julius Benedict), gave their first concert for the benefit of the Infirmary, under the patronage of the Right Honourable the Earl of Devon, the Hon. and Rev. H. H. Courtenay, the Hon. and Rev. C. L. Courtenay, and many ladies and gentlemen of the town and neighbourhood. The artists were Miss Banks, Madame Dryden-Serquet, Herr Schuberth, Miss Hincks, assisted by the Teignmouth Branch of the Schubert Society, who provided part-songs and choruses, and Mr G. G. Leader. The programme began with the "Grand Duo du Couronnement," by Herz and Labarre, for harp and pianoforte, played by Madame Dryden-Serquet and Miss Hincks. Miss Banks' song, "Over hill, over dale," by T. Cooke, took the next place. Miss Hincks followed with Thalberg's "Fantasia on Russian Airs," and three Welsh melodies, given as part-songs by some of the members of the Schubert Society, accompanied on the harp (alone) by Madame Dryden-Serquet. Herr Schuberth (who was received with applause each time he appeared, and whom the audience seemed pleased to greet again on this his second appearance in Teignmouth), now gave a solo by Raff, which was beautifully and tastefully executed. Next in the programme came the song, "In the green spring," composed by Miss Hincks, who accompanied it (with violoncello obbligato by Herr Schuberth). It was capitally sung by Miss Banks. Among the best vocal pieces was Formes' popular Lied, "In sheltered vale," sung with pathos and effect by Mr G. G. Leader. "The Vale of Avoca" as a part-song, and the lively air of "The Shamrock" as a full chorus, terminated a most agreeable concert. The platform looked very picturesque. The white dresses of the ladies of the chorus contrasted agreeably with the dark green of the beautiful evergreens (kindly lent by Mr Hannaford), which bordered the platform.

ROYAL ALBERT HALL CONCERTS.—Mendelssohn's Elijah is announced for the next performance of the Royal Albert Hall Choral Society, under the direction of Mr Barnby, on Tuesday next, the 23rd inst., with Madame Marie Roze, Miss Antoinette Sterling, Mr Whitney, &c., as the principal vocalists. The next Popular Ballad Concert will take place on Saturday, the 27th inst., when Madame Lemmens-Sherrington, Miss Edith Wynne, Miss Antoinette Sterling, Mr Thurley Beale, &c., will sing, and Mr Henry Logé will make his début here as a pianist. The Part-Song Choir of the Royal Albert Hall Choral Society, under Mr Barnby's direction, will, as usual, sing several madrigals and part-songs. A Welsh Festival Concert is announced for St David's Day (March 1).

BERLIN.—Besides Mad. Mallinger, who, as already announced in this paper, will shortly cease to be a member of the company at the Royal Operahouse, Madlle Grossi, also, will not renew her present engagement, which terminates with the present season. A difference of opinion as to money matters between the young lady and the management is said to be the cause of this step.—Madlle Ormay, from the Strassburgh Stadttheater, recently appeared as the heroine in La Jolie Parfumeuse at the Wallner-Theatre. Neither as an actress nor a singer did she produce a very favourable impression.—Mad. Bianca Blume Santer, formerly of the Royal Operahouse, will, after several years' absence from this capital, sing during the summer at Kroll's Theatre.—M. Anton Rubinstein has been stopping here since the commencement of the month, discussing the mise-en-scène of his new opera, Judith, at first called Die Maccabäer, which will be produced some time in April. Madlle Brandt will sustain the principal female part, Lea.

RICHARD WAGNER'S REMINISCENCES OF SPONTINI.

(From "Le Ménestrel.")

III.

The performance of The Vestal went off with great precision, and the artists displayed all possible zeal. But, from the very earliest scenes, a drawback, of which no one had thought, struck us all, and was evident to the most inattentive observer. Our great Schröder-Devrient was evidently no longer of an age to sustain the part of Julia. Her physiognomy and bearing betrayed a certain maternal something or other agreeing little with the spring-tide graces of the Priestess who is designated in the libretto as simply the youngest of the Vestals. The disproportion between the personage and her interpreter struck the spectator still more when Julia appeared side by side with the Chief Vestal represented by my niece, Johanna Wagner, then a young girl aged seventeen, in all the splendour of her beauty. Her youth was so dazzling that no stage artifice could disguise it; her fine voice and good delivery, the result of her happy natural qualities, caused in every one an involuntary desire to reverse the cast, and to put the one lady in the place of the other. This unfavourable coincidence could not escape the penetrating glance of Mad. Schröder-Devrient, but she hoped to regain the lost ground and dispel any prejudicial prepossession by bringing to bear all the intensity of the means which her talent placed at her command. Unfortunately, the desire to acquit herself well induced her frequently to overdo the part, and sometimes to exaggerate it in a manner which was really deplorable. Thus, after the great trio in the second act, when, on the flight of Licinius, Julia, breathless and exhausted, drags herself to the extremity of the stage, and allows the cry of hope: "He will live!" to escape from her oppressed soul, Mad. Schröder-Devrient considered she might presume to speak these words instead of singing them. She had on several previous occasions already tried the effect of a word simply declaimed and flung suddenly into the midst of the music in a prominent scene. For instance, in Fidelio, when she exclaimed: "One step more and you are dead!" she never failed to speak rather than sing the word: dead. I myself have experienced the shudder which this effect caused to run through the audience. At this cry, an involuntary feeling of terror seized on me, and, as though by a blow from a hatchet, I seemed rudely precipitated into the sombre horrors of reality from the ideal heights to which music raises every situation, even the most horrible. This effect touches visibly the extreme limits of the Sublime; it is like the blasting shock with which two distinct worlds come into collision, and the flash which escapes permits us suddenly to embrace at a glance a double reality. But how difficult it is to seize this fugitive instant. How foolish of anyone to suppose it can be brought about at one's mere will and employed for a purely personal end! I saw this but too clearly in the present instance, for Mad. Schröder's attempt was a sad failure. The absence of character in her utterance and the hollowness of her voice produced a painful impression. It appeared as though a torrent of ice-cold water had been suddenly poured upon the heads of the public, and everyone agreed that the singer had produced an effect exactly opposite to that she had dreamt of producing. As to the general impression made by the work, public admiration obstinately refused to rise to the pitch of enthusiasm. Expectation had, no doubt, been too much excited, and the augmentation in the prices of admission, which had been doubled, under the pretext that Spontini himself would conduct, had provoked more than one manifestation of discontent. Perhaps, also, despite the beauties and the splendour of the music, the style of the work, with its antique subject dished up according to French taste, had become slightly old and out of date. Perhaps, too, the languid conclusion and the unsuccessful effects of Mad. Devrient, were not foreign to the lamentable coldness on the part of the public. However this may have been, the applause struck me not so much as homage paid to the beauty of the opera as a respectful consecration of the universal reputation enjoyed by the composer, and I could not help experiencing a painful feeling when I saw the latter, decked out in all his crosses and all his orders, come forward on the stage in reply to the acclamations, of somewhat short duration, which were raised for him at the fall of the curtain. He was not deceived, however, by the reception accorded to his work, but he flattered himself he could force the success, or, at least, save appearances. To manage this, he thought of the means which stood him in such good stead at Berlin, where his operas always filled the house, and were played to enthusiastic audiences. He confiscated to his profit our paying day, and promised to conduct The Vestal for the second time on the Sunday following. As that day was rather distant, he was obliged to make a longer stay in Dresden, a fact which procured me the pleasure of passing a little more time in his interesting society. I have faithfully preserved the memory of our long conversations, and of the many hours we spent together, sometimes at Mad. Schröder's house, and sometimes at mine. I will state a few of my reminiscences.

I especially remember a dinner at Mad. Schröder's, which Spontini attended, with his wife, a sister of Erard, the celebrated pianoforte maker. We had a very long and animated conversation. The part at first taken by Spontini in our discussions was rather small. He began by manifesting reserve and listening in silence, with an air which seemed to imply that he would not give his opinion, unless we took the trouble to ask for it. When he condescended to open his lips, he expressed himself with pompous rhetoric and haughty emphasis, formulating his ideas in peremptory and categorical phrases, the sententious tone of which did not appear to admit the possibility of contradiction. To doubt his infallibility would have been to offer him an insult—a grave outrage. But, at the party of which I am speaking, he was more unconstrained, and grew quite warm by the time the cloth was cleared. I have already said that he had taken a liking to me, and displayed an attachment as strong as was compatible with his disposition. He now declared openly that he entertained a feeling of friendship for me, and meant to prove it by endeavouring to preserve me from the fatal idea of following the career of a dramatic composer. He expected, he said, to have some trouble in convincing me of the excellence of his reasons, and of making me understand the service he was conferring, but the matter inspired him with such interest, and struck him as so important, that he was ready to stop a few months in Dresden to accomplish it. In this case, he observed, we might turn his sojourn to account by getting up some of his other works, especially Agnes of Hohenstaufen, which he declared himself ready to conduct as he had conducted The Vestal. To make me perceive clearly my temerity in venturing upon a career illustrated by Spontini, he began by addressing me a peculiarly flattering eulogium, and this is what he said*: "Quand j'ai entendu votre Rienzi, j'ai dit: C'est un homme de génie, mais déjà il a plus fait qu'il ne peut faire" ("When I heard your Rienzi I said: This is a man of genius, but he has already done more than he can do.")—To furnish me with the key to this paradox, he added: "Après Gluck, c'est moi qui ai fait la grande révolution avec La Vestale. J'ai introduit le Vorhalt† de la sexte" (sic) "dans l'harmonie et la grosse caisse dans l'orchestre. Avec Cortez j'ai fait un pas plus avant; puis j'ai fait trois pas avec Olympie.—Nurmahal, Alcidor, et tout ce que j'ai fait dans les premiers temps de Berlin, je vous le livre. C'étaient des œuvres occasionelles; mais puis j'ai fait cent pas en avant avec Agnès de Hohenstaufen, où j'ai imaginé un emploi de l'orchestre remplaçant parfaitement l'orgue." ("After Gluck, it is I who brought about the great revolution with the Vestal. It was I who introduced the Vorhalt de la sexte" (sic) "in the harmony and the big drum in the orchestra. With Cortez I made a step further; then I made three with Olympia.—As for Nurmahal, Alcidor, and all I did during the first part of my residence in Berlin, I deliver them up to your mercy. They were occasional works; but I then took a hundred steps forward with Agnes of Hohenstaufen, where I thought of a way of employing the orchestra so as perfectly to replace the organ." He added that since then he had busied himself with a libretto called the Athenians. The Prince Royal of Prussia had strongly pressed him to set it to music. To give a proof of what he said, he took from his pocket-book several of his Highness's letters, and handed them to us. When we had read them through, he went on to say that, despite this flattering pressure, he had definitively given up the idea of setting the libretto, though he thought the subject excellent. His reason for this resolution was his conviction that he should never succeed in excelling Agnes of Hohenstaufen, or in inventing a newer style, and finer music. He then wound up, by way of conclusion: "Or, comment voulez-vous que quiconque puisse inventer quelquechose de nouveau, moi, Spontini, déclarant ne pouvoir en aucune façon surpasser mes œuvres précédentes; d'autre part étant avisé que depuis La Vestale il n'a point été écrite une note qui ne fût volée dans mes partitions." ("Now, how do you suppose anyone can invent aught new, when I, Spontini, declare that I cannot by any possibility surpass my preceding works, while, on the other hand, aware that, since The Vestal, there has not been written a note which was not stolen from my scores.")

ROYAL ALBERT HALL CONCERTS.

The directors of the Royal Albert Hall Concerts show no diminution of energy. The attractions provided for the "Popular" concert given last night were abundant, and might have been expected to attract a larger attendance. The list of vocalists included the names of Madame Lemmens-Sherrington, Miss Annie Sinclair, and Miss Sterling; Mr W. H. Cummings, with the excellent part-song choir of the Royal Albert Hall Choral Society. Mr G. Martin was organist, and Herr Wilhelmj was also engaged. Mr Barnby conducted, and the accompaniments were in the skilful hands of Mr Randegger. Whether the most was made of these valuable materials may be questioned; but beyond a doubt there was much to enjoy and much to praise in the execution of the various selections included in the programme. By far the best and most delightful of the vocal performances were those of the Part-Song Choir, which were alone well worth the journey to Kensington. It would be difficult to find a finer body of sixty voices; but their vocal endowments are by no means their highest distinction. They have learned to suppress all individuality, and they sing as if the whole body of voices belonged to but one mind. Madame Lemmens-Sherrington's first song, "The Wren's Nest," was sung with that admirable vocalization for which this excellent artist is distinguished; and it was only to be regretted that her powers should be employed on so feeble a composition. In the old Scotch ballad, "John Anderson, my jo," she vindicated her reputation as one of our best ballad singers, and sang charmingly. Miss Annie Sinclair, a promising young artist, essayed the Jewel Song from Gounod's Faust, a song by no means suitable for concert purposes, and hardly within her powers. Her second song, "The Bailiff's Daughter of Islington," was more successful, but would have been improved by a more dramatic and natural manner of relating the incidents of the familiar legend. Miss Sterling sang, with rare beauty of voice and intense dramatic expression, Blumenthal's "Lament of the Border Widow" by no means a favourable specimen of the composer—and Mr Barnby's new song, "When the tide comes in," a graceful composition, in which a tragic story is sympathetically treated. On each occasion Miss Sterling was warmly greeted. Mr Cummings sang with success "Only for thee," by J. L. Roeckel, and a new song, entitled "Yes," by J. Blumenthal, which is not equal to former works by the same composer. The old ballad, "Sally in our alley," well sung by Mr Cummings, produced double effect from the contrast with its predecessors. Mr Whitney sang with good taste Mr John Oxenford's "Down deep within the cellar," three spirited verses to an old German tune, Mr Barnby's "Bells of St Ethelred," and Balfe's "Heart bowed down." Mr Martin, in his rendering of Bach's Gavotte in B minor, and in a March by T. Hewlett, proved himself to be an accomplished organist. How Mr Barnby and Mr Randegger acquitted themselves it is unnecessary to say. The "lion" of the evening was Herr Wilhelmj, who played for his first solo Ernst's "Elégie." His powerful tone, particularly on the fourth string, was as remarkable as heretofore, and his mechanism was almost perfect. Herr Wilhelmj's second solo—his own paraphrase of the slow movement in Chopin's Pianoforte Concerto—was far more successful. He was loudly applauded on both occasions.

Elijah will be given next Tuesday, with full orchestra and chorus, under the direction of Mr Barnby.

HOPWOOD & CREW'S SALE.

The sale by auction of the stock of music plates and copyrights of Messrs Hopwood & Crew, just concluded by Messrs Puttick & Simpson, of Leicester Square, in which the music trade and profession generally have taken considerable interest, is remarkable for the large, and in many cases extraordinary, prices obtained. Among the more prominent may be cited lots 44, Blamphin's Dreaming of Angels, £63 16s. (Brewer). 61. The same composer's Just touch the Harp gently, £113 15s. (ditto). 81. Pretty Swallow, also by Blamphin, £69 (J. Williams). 168. Signor Campana's Speak to me, £110 (Chappell). 175. The Scout, by the same composer. This song (rendered famous by the singing of Mr Santley), after a spirited competition, fell to Mr Morley, junr., at the large sum of £312. Lot 201. Clifton (H.), As Welcome as the Flowers in May, £72 (Metzler). 224. Ditto, It's really very singular, £82 10s. (ditto). 258. Coote (C.), Archery Galop, £96 (Ashdown & Parry). 260. Ditto, Awfully Jolly Waltz, £94 10s. (ditto). 271. Ditto, Burlesque Valse, £175 10s. (ditto). 288. The Cornflower Valse, £132 (ditto). 361. Clifton (H.), Pulling hard against the Stream, £67 10s. (J. Williams). 364. Ditto, Robinson Crusoe, £132 (ditto). 398. Ditto, Where there's a will there's a way, £61 10s. (J. Williams). 407. Wait for the turn of the Tide, £75 (ditto). 509. Hobson's Come sing to me, £83 15s. (ditto). 510. Complaints, or the Ills of Life, by the same composer, £85 10s. (ditto). 527. Howard (R.), You'll never miss the water till the well runs dry, £165 (B. Williams). 579. Coote's Just Out Galop, £73 12s. (Chappell). 625. Ditto, Pretty Bird Valse, £66 6s. (ditto). 631. Ditto, Prince Imperial Galop. This lot was knocked down to Mr J. Williams, amidst considerable applause, for £990, the largest price, we believe, ever obtained for a single piece of dance music. Lot 655. Coote's Sweetly Pretty Valse, £245 (Chappell). 660. Hobson's Popular Favourites for the Pianoforte, £412 10s. (ditto). 682. Buckley's Come where the moonbeams linger, £157 10s. (ditto). 684. Clifton (H.), Very Suspicious, £330 (J. Williams). 686. Ditto, Folly and Fashion, £72 10s. (Ashdown & Parry). 710. Hunt (G. W.), The Belle of the Ball, £90 (Bath). 937. Coote, The Encore Galop, £122 8s., purchased by the composer. 953. The Snowdrift Galop, £561, also purchased by Mr Coote. 974. Coote & Tinney's Ball Room Album, £110 (Chappell). 1060. Read (J.), Down by the Old Mill Stream, £78 (Bath). 1152. Thomas (J. R.), The Birds will come again, £153 (J. Williams). 1187. Vane (B.), I never was meant for the sea, £85 (Bath). 1315. Fizz Galop, by Tinney, £76 14s. (Chappell). 1325. Robert Coote's Ball Room Guide, £150 (Willey). Total, nearly £15,000.

PARMA.—At the second performance of Il Conte Verde, the composer, Sig. Libani, was called on 30 times.

BRUNSWICK.—Sig. Verdi's Aida has been successfully produced at the Ducal Theatre. Mesdlles Preiss, Scheuerlein, Herren H. Schrötter, Ulbricht, and Hieb, sustained the principal parts. They were warmly applauded and called on several times. The band and chorus were especially good; the scenery, dresses, and decorations, all that could be desired.

ST PETERSBURGH.—M. Anton Rubinstein's new opera, The Demon, was produced on the 25th January. There is no overture. The curtain rises on an instrumental introduction, with an invisible chorus of good and of bad spirits. It is night, and a violent storm is raging. The Demon, the principle of evil, is implacably bent on the ruin of innocence, personified in the young Princess Tamara, the betrothed of Sainodal, an Eastern prince. To the principle of evil is opposed the principle of good, represented by an Angel. Both the Demon and the Angel, at the commencement of the piece, claim entire power over the destinies of the human race. The second scene represents a smiling landscape bathed in sunshine. Tamara appears in the midst of a chorus of maidens, to whom she imparts her hopes. The scene changes again, and exhibits a caravan led by her lover, Sainodal. A savage horde attacks it, and Sainodal is killed in the conflict. The second act passes in the palace of Prince Gudal, Tamara's father. Splendid festivities are being celebrated in honour of Sainodal's arrival. They are interrupted by the intelligence of his death. Tamara, in despair, begs permission of her father to enter a cloister. The third act is consecrated to the temptation of Tamara, whom the Angel of Good in vain endeavours to snatch from the grasp of the Demon. Tamara succumbs, but a last prayer saves her, and the Demon flees to the regions below. The libretto, founded on a well-known legend by Lermontoff, is by a Russian poet, Wiskowatoff. This is the composer's seventh opera. The first, Dmitri Donskoi, dates from 1849, and was represented here three times; then came Vengeance and The Seven Hunters of Siberia, never acted. These were succeeded by Feramors, The Sons of the Heath, and The Maccabeans, the last of which is now being got up at Berlin and Paris.

Mdme Patey, Mr W. H. Cummings, and Mr Patey will make a short professional tour in Devonshire and Cornwall at Easter—may success wait on them.

The Crystal Palace English operatic performances will be resumed in May next, and it is at present proposed to bring them to a conclusion at the end of July.

The Sacred Harmonic Society, on Friday last week, gave a performance of Mozart's Mass in C, Spohr's Christian's Prayer, and Mendelssohn's Athalie, with Miss Edith Wynne, Miss Elton, Mr Guy, and Mr Theodore Distin as vocalists, and Mr John Ryder as reciter of the verses in Athalie.

An old relic of the Hanover Square Rooms has departed. James Fitzgerald, the carriage attendant at the Queen's Concert Rooms, died on the 4th inst (aged 74). He was the oldest man in that line of business, and about the last of the old school. He was well known to most of the nobility and aristocracy, and generally respected by all who knew him.

Prof. Mulder Fabbri, husband of Madame Inez Fabbri, and for many years a well-known musician and orchestral conductor at San Francisco, died in that city December 22nd, aged fifty-two. San Francisco owes him several seasons of opera, which were rightly called polyglot, but which did much to strengthen and improve the musical tastes of the people on the Pacific coast. He left his wife in easy circumstances.

The Alexandra Theatre, in Park Street, Camden Town, re-opened on Saturday last, under the direction of Mr Thorpe Pede, whose operetta, Marguerite, was among the attractions of the evening, with Miss Gertrude Ashton and Mr J. W. Turner in the principal parts. The novelty of the evening was an operetta by M. Charles Lecocq, played for the first time in England. It is entitled, Eighteen Years in one Hour. The chief parts were ably sustained by Mr Herberte and Miss J. Coventry. The operetta pleased very much, a chorus of old men being especially admired. We congratulate Mr Pede on having so successfully begun his opera season.

We subjoin the programme of Professor Oakeley's third orchestral concert, at the Reed commemorative festival, on Wednesday, Feb. 17th:—

PART FIRST.—Overture, Merry Wives of Windsor—Nicolai; Serenade (Mr Pearson)—Schubert; Ave Maria, arranged on Bach's 1st Prelude, for soprano, violin, organ, and piano (Solo Violin, Mr Carrodus)—Gounod; "Qui sdegno," from Flauto Magico (Mr Whitney)—Mozart; Symphony in A minor (the Scotch)—Mendelssohn. PART SECOND.—Funeral March (in Memoriam) (conducted, by request, by the composer)—H. S. Oakeley; Fantaisie Overture, Paradise and Peri—Sterndale Bennett (Obit. 1st Feb., 1875); "Come into the garden, Maud" (Mr Pearson)—Balfe; Flute solo on a German air (Mr Keppel)—Boehm; "I'm a Roamer," from Son and Stranger (Mr Whitney)—Mendelssohn; Festal March, "Edinburgh" (conducted by the composer)—H. S. Oakeley; "God save the Queen."

We (Arcadian) used to think that the great P. T. Barnum was the prince of advertisers, and had exhausted every known dodge and trick. He has, however, been outdone by Sherry Shook, the proprietor of the Union Square Theatre, and bosom friend of N. Hart Jackson, Esq. A few days ago Mr Shook induced one of the Mulberry street detectives to steal his watch. The news of the robbery was spread about in all the papers, and interesting paragraphs were made up showing how the thief's attention was attracted by Mr Shook's continual application to his watch to see whether the various tableaux of The Two Orphans were on time. Some days were permitted to elapse, and then more paragraphs were sent to the papers, stating how a mysterious individual came to the Union Square Theatre, demanded to see Mr Shook, took him on one side, and, in a sepulchral whisper, asked whether he had not lost a watch. Mr Shook replied that he had. Whereupon the mysterious individual aforesaid observed: "Here it is." "What's to pay?" inquired Mr Shook. "Nuffin'," was the reply. "I used to be a bad'un, but since I saw them two orfle 'un's I is a reformed card."

English opera has drawn such large audiences lately at the Philharmonic Theatre, Islington, that the directors have resolved to give a series of English operatic performances on a more important scale. Several new engagements have been made, and on Saturday, February 27, Wallace's Maritana will be produced, with Miss Rose Hersee in the title character. Other distinguished artists will, on this occasion, make their first appearance at the Philharmonic Theatre.

The Theatre Royal of Edinburgh, the principal place of amusement in that city, was totally burned to the ground on Saturday last week The cause of the fire has not been ascertained, but it is believed that it originated from an explosion of gas connected with the lime-light apparatus used in the pantomime. This is the third time the Royal Theatre has been destroyed by fire within the last forty years. It was burnt to the ground in 1853, and again about twelve years later, while under the present management. The building was purchased last year by a private gentleman who resided in Edinburgh, but who was at one time a banker in London. He is fully insured.

MADRID.—Verdi's Mass will shortly be executed here.

GENOA.—Salvator Rosa, by Sig. Gomez, has been revived and favourably received at the Carlo Felice.

PALERMO.—Mignon, by M. Ambroise Thomas, is in rehearsal at the Teatro Bellini. According to report, it will be followed by I promessi Sposi of Sig. Ponchielli.

GENEVA.—A short time since, the first stone was laid of the new theatre to be erected with a part of the money left to the City by the late ex-Duke of Brunswick.

BRESLAU.—The programme of the eighth Subscription Concert given by the Orchestral Union included, as a novelty, Herr Raff's new Symphony, No. 6, in D minor. The work met with a favourable reception.

DUSSELDORF.—At a recent concert of the Instrumental Union, one of the attractions was the overture to a new opera, Alcida, by Herr Thooft. It produced a good impression. The entire opera will most probably be brought out here next season.

VIENNA.—At the Imperial Operahouse, the new opera Der Widerspenstigen Zähmung, by Herr Götz, proved a decided hit. The next novelty, to be produced at the end of the present month is Die Königin von Saba, by Herr Goldmark. This will be followed by Die Folkerungen, of Herr Edmund Kretschmer. The last two librettos are by Dr Mosenthal. Herr Jacob Müller, the well-known baritone from the Comic Opera, is engaged in the place of Dr Kraus.

THE FORMATION AND CULTIVATION OF THE VOICE FOR SINGING.
Price 12s.
London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, REGENT STREET, W.
"The remarkable qualities of this book are the author's freedom from conventional trammels, the strong sense of his opinions, and the novelty yet evident soundness of his precepts; his work has consequently come into general use as a manual of vocal instruction."—Daily News.

DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE,
For invigorating and enriching the voice, and removing affections of the throat.

DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE is universally acknowledged to be the most valuable remedy for sore throat, hoarseness and relaxed throat. It should always be taken before singing or reciting, as it strengthens the vocal organs. It is most extensively prescribed by the faculty for the throat and voice. Dr Lewis of Basingstoke says he finds them most efficacious, and in Dr Copland's Dictionary of Practical Medicine (Longman & Co.), they are strongly recommended at pages 872 and 1492. They are used by all the greatest vocalists and orators in Europe, and have been established over a quarter of a century. Testimonials from Patti, Grisi, Lablache, Santley, &c. Sold in boxes, 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. by all Chemists throughout the United Kingdom and the Colonies.

Couvrir dix fois de leur feuillage
Les vieux saules de nos étangs,
Que, sans pitié pour mon jeune âge,
Dieu m'a ravi le guide aimé
Qui me prodiguait ses tendresses!
Je pleure son regard charmé!
Je ne reçois plus ses caresses!

Ainsi parlait, en gémissant,
Une orpheline désolée;
Mais un bel ange, l'embrassant,
Lui dit, d'une voix inspirée:
"Ne pleure plus et sois ma sœur
Ma mère sera notre mère,
Et tu verras que du bonheur
Il en est encor sur la terre!"

CRYSTAL PALACE CONCERTS.

The weather notwithstanding (and it could hardly have been worse), there was a fair attendance at the concert of Saturday afternoon. The programme, although comprising no entire orchestral symphony, generally the "pièce de resistance," at these entertainments, presented sufficient variety of attraction, and the audience showed by their applause throughout that they were more than satisfied. The overture to Die Entführung aus dem Serail (Seraglio), one of Mozart's most spirited and characteristic dramatic preludes, was a good beginning. The members of the orchestra, judging by the animation they threw into their performance, seemed thoroughly to enjoy the task allotted to them. We have never heard the overture go better, rarely so well. It is a pity there should not be many more such joyous preludes. "Love laid his sleeping head," a tenor song, composed by Mr Arthur Sullivan (to stanzas by Algernon Swinburne), for his incidental music to the Merry Wives of Windsor, and marked by genuine feeling, was given with true expression by Mr Edward Lloyd. Nothing could have afforded a more striking contrast to the overture than this graceful effusion which, if on that account alone, was sure to make an impression. The song was much liked, and equally so the singer; but, on being called for, Mr Lloyd merely bowed, declining to accept an "encore," thereby following the initiative frequently set by an eminent brother artist.

What came next was in still livelier contrast. The pianoforte concerto in F minor of Herr Johannes Brahms, a comparatively early work, belongs, nevertheless, to modern German art in its highest form of development. How Robert Schumann first made acquaintance with Brahms, what he thought of him at the time, and the prophecy he made of his future career has been more than once narrated. Whether Schumann's predictions are destined to be fulfilled to the letter, time alone can prove; one thing, however, is certain, that Brahms has for a long period been steadily advancing, and that he already stands foremost in the estimation of his compatriots, who year after year confer upon him fresh honours. Away from his home, too, Brahms progresses surely, if slowly. Here in England he has found very many sincere admirers, which Mr Manns at the Crystal Palace, and Mr Arthur Chappell at St James's Hall, were not slow to perceive, and, perceiving, to profit by, for the benefit of their respective patrons. Some of the chamber music of Brahms has for years been known to various select circles, but now not only his chamber music, but his orchestral music and his sacred music are becoming in a certain degree familiar to the general public. He thus obtains more and more chances of appreciation, and it is to be hoped that the favourite of Schumann will as nearly as possible (for Schumann talked in a highly rhapsodical vein on the subject), realize the hopes of his friend and master. In one sense he already does—the influence of Schumann being clearly manifest in not a few of the compositions Herr Brahms has given to the art. Among these may be cited the pianoforte concerto introduced for the second time at the Crystal Palace Concerts on Saturday. The first to play it at these concerts was a young English pianist, Miss Baglehole, a student, under Mr W. H. Holmes, at the Royal Academy of Music. In each of the three movements, the first and last especially, we detect signs of the influence to which reference has been made—not plagiarism, be it understood, but what appears to indicate unmistakable sympathy. There are occasional passages, moreover, which remind us that Herr Brahms leans also towards Beethoven, just as Schumann did himself in the prime of his artistic career. He might do worse, seeing that he possesses unquestionable originality of his own. The concerto in F minor is, in certain respects, one of the most difficult tasks to set before a pianist, even at a time when the possession of mechanical dexterity is too often looked upon as an end rather than as a means. Then, the tax upon the physical powers of the solo performer is made heavier by the full, elaborate, and incessant employment of the orchestra, both in "tutti" and accompaniment—which latter, in sundry instances, if not carefully toned down by the conductor—a feat by no means over-easy—is calculated now and then to drown the notes of the pianoforte. No such mishap occurred, however—which may be readily believed when it is added that the pianist was Mdlle Marie Krebs. This young lady is equal to any, the most trying, bravura passages, surmounting them with invariable ease; while her touch is so elastic, her tone so powerful and telling, that no amount of orchestral colouring, however indiscriminately laid on, seems to interfere with the unchecked freedom of her manipulation. Mdlle Krebs played from beginning to end without book—a custom we cannot altogether approve in the instance of concertos, where there are others besides the solo performer upon whom a considerable share of the responsibility devolves. Firm as a rock, however, she has seldom played more brilliantly, with better sustained fluency, and—remembering the adagio, and its several phrases of cantabile—with an expression more delicately balanced, while free from the slightest tinge of exaggeration. No success could have been completer, and rarely has unanimous applause followed a display of executive art more thoroughly deserving.

The concerto was succeeded by two airs from the late Sterndale Bennett's Woman of Samaria—"Oh Lord! Thou hast searched me out," which could not have been sung with a deeper insight into its character and meaning than that evinced by Mdme Patey (fresh from her Paris successes); and "His salvation is nigh them that fear Him," to which Mr Lloyd did every justice. It was hardly discreet, we think, in a concert-room, to place two airs, so quietly unobtrusive, one immediately after the other; but, as both are pure gems of devotional song, they were acceptable all the same. About the two movements from Schubert's unfinished symphony in B minor, perhaps the most precious of the several MSS. which Mr G. Grove had the good fortune to discover at Vienna and introduce to England, we can only repeat what we have said before—that they exhibit their gifted author at his best, which causes all the more regret that so beautiful a work should have come to us in an incomplete shape. Never have the two movements been listened to with more earnest and absorbing attention, and never, it should also be stated, have they been interpreted in a style more nearly bordering on the ideal perfection to which they emphatically point. The wind instruments in the lovely Andante were absolutely irreproachable; but, where all was truly excellent, it would be invidious to single out further examples for special eulogy. At the conclusion the audience expressed their gratification with unbounded heartiness, so much so that Mr Manns, the conductor, turned round and applauded his own orchestra—a little breach of etiquette quite pardonable under the circumstances. M. Gounod's sacred ballad, "There is a green hill far away," sung by Mdme Patey, and a very effectively scored Festival Overture, written by Herr Krebs, Kapellmeister of Dresden (father of Mdlle Marie), in commemoration of the German victories in the war of 1870-71, played with congenial spirit by the orchestra, brought this very interesting concert to a close.

At the concert to-day, Saturday, Jeanne d'Arc, "a dramatic scena," by Mr Alfred Holmes, is to be given for the first time; and for next Saturday, the "Sterndale Bennett Memorial Concert," at which the entire programme will be made up from the compositions of our late countryman, is announced.—Times.

BRUNSWICK.—It is some time since any theatrical event created so much sensation here as the appearance of Mad. Lucca, for one night only, as Selica, in L'Africaine. The theatre was crowded to suffocation, though the prices of admission were doubled, and, in some instances, even trebled. The audience were enthusiastic, and applauded most vigorously on every possible opportunity.

VIENNA.—The new opera, Cagliostro in Wien, by Herr Johann Strauss, is nearly finished. The first and second acts have already been in rehearsal for some time. The work will very shortly be produced at the Theater an der Wien.—Sig. Franchi, the manager, has been expected here for some time past, to make arrangements for the appearance of Mad. Adelina Patti, which will take place at the Comic Opera in the early part of March. Mad. Patti will sing on sixteen evenings, and in the following operas: Dinorah, Il Trovatore, Il Barbiere, Don Pasquale, Lucia, La Sonnambula, La Traviata, and, perhaps, Faust.

THE CORONATION OF QUEEN VICTORIA.

AN ORCHESTRAL FOCUS.

(From "Journal and Jottings," by Henry W. Goodban.)

I can only record certain circumstances that struck my mind very forcibly during the progress of the ceremony—the details are written elsewhere. One of the most thrilling and impressive was when the Archbishop of Canterbury was crowning the Queen. Every part of the ceremony had been rehearsed and timed; and, whilst he held the crown over her head, previous to its descending upon her brow, he repeated a prayer. At the moment it touched her forehead the peers and peeresses raised their coronets, which had been hitherto held by their pages, and placed them on their heads. The sun—the great colourist of life, which up to this moment had been hiding his glory, fused into his rays all the tints that colour the world—burst forth in all his splendour, and, through the stained glass window facing the throne, threw such streams of light upon the crown diamonds and the surrounding and abounding gems, that made a blaze of sparkling brilliancy never to be witnessed a second time in a life's span, inaugurating the coronation of the maiden Queen with a happy halo of rich lustre. The cannons in St James's Park boomed forth their salute; the bells from all the surrounding churches clanged their clappers in a joy-fire; the air reverberated with shouts from the people of "Long live the Queen, hurrah;" the excitement was beyond my power to describe; my flesh crept, and I felt as if I belonged to the feathered race, and wanted to mount into the air, but had suddenly been plucked by electricity, leaving an effect of cold shiver on a warm summer's day.

The Queen's mind, no doubt, in the midst of this din and enthusiasm, was centred in an appeal to "Our Father," for strength, wisdom, and grace to support her in the position it had pleased Him to call her to. "How well the human heart was known to Him who first called God by the name of Our Father." After Her Majesty had been crowned, the peers ascended the dais to the throne where she sat to receive the oaths of fealty from each in order and turn, according to their rank and precedence. It is the privilege of the peers, after taking the oath of allegiance, to kiss the cheek of the monarch. As the Queen was only a girl of nineteen years of age, it was thought that upwards of 350 kisses, disbursed from lips of men, young, middle-aged, and old, would not be a very agreeable or fragrant proceeding, but a dose sufficient to make the recipient hope never to receive more than one at a time for the rest of a life. It was, therefore, decided that a ceremony of more delicacy and less fatigue might be substituted; so, as the peers passed the throne, they kissed her hand instead of her cheek.

As Lord Rolle, a very old and infirm nobleman, was descending the steps, he missed his footing, fell and literally rolled down, causing great consternation and alarm amongst the surrounding peers. Her Majesty rose from the throne, prompted by the impulse of her youthful and sympathetic nature, as if with the intention of giving some personal help in the matter of picking him up; but as he was soon reinstated in a horizontal position, and was not much hurt, the commotion soon subsided. This solemn ceremony had its ludicrous side also. Whilst the peers were paying homage to the Queen, the treasurer of the household appeared on the scene, with his attendants, carrying bags of gold and silver coronation medals, which he commenced to scatter amongst the people, who shouted "Largesse, largesse!" As he proceeded down the choir, many of the occupants of the front seats left their places, and joined in the scramble for possession of some of the desired medals, with an exception on the part of the judges, who preserved the dignity of their position by remaining in their places, and looking on at this very extraordinary scene, contenting themselves by each holding up a hand as the treasurer passed, hoping that a medal or two might come within their catch. This event must have reminded the participators of their school-boy days, when they had scrambled in their playgrounds. Possibly "my luds" might have wished they could have laid aside their judgeships for a time, and joined in the melée and fun it caused. The young pages were the most rampant and active; they thought nothing of pitching over anyone, in their way, when they fixed their will upon the possession of any glittering piece that caught their eyes. I saw one of the heralds absolutely sprawling on the carpet from a push given him by one of these irresistible scapegraces, when he stooped to gain possession of a desired medal, which he did not get. The page was too agile for him. Some few were thrown into the orchestra, but only those sitting near the front had a chance of getting any.

The efforts of the fine band of 120 instrumentalists and a chorus of greater number were not taxed very severely, as the music, though a great feature, was not super-abundant in quantity. Handel's Coronation Anthem ("Zadok the Priest") and one composed by William Knyvett, who held the appointment of State composer, and whose duty it was at such a ceremony to produce some new musical emanation of his brain àpropos of the occasion. These, with the "Hallelujah" Chorus, were the most important features in the programme, and the effect produced by the first and last was remarkably fine. Old Handel's everlasting and grandly effective compositions, with their broad harmonies, reverberated round the Abbey walls gloriously. The State Composer's effort may be said to have been a weak one, as far as any display of genius or gain to art was concerned.

When the ceremony was over, the procession was formed in the same way as it had entered. The Queen left the throne and took her place in it, walked down the middle of the choir and nave "crowned Monarch of the realm," amidst the reiterated shouts of the people who had been privileged to assist in this remarkable event.

The scene then became varied. Everybody left their seats to depart eventually as they could. They walked about wherever they pleased—some chatting with and greeting their friends, others, worn out with excitement and hunger, applying themselves to their sandwich boxes and flasks. The appearance from the orchestra was that of an animated, lunatic Turkey carpet, acting in a kaleidoscopic fashion. All the colours and gems changed places incessantly, the wearers thereof moving about in the most brilliant confusion. The steps to the throne were soon taken possession of by the loveliest of ladies in the most elegant toilettes, petting the prettiest of pages, and surrounded by the happiest of cavaliers, attending these daintiest of dames and damsels.

I passed into the choir and was in the midst of this gorgeous glory—inspected the altar with its golden communion plate and purple velvet appointments, gazed with wonder upon the dress and hat Prince Esterhazy wore, covered with diamonds and pearls, admired the Countess of Essex (Miss Stephens), the once celebrated vocalist, and a great deal else that was attractive, and then made my way through the crowd into the nave, when another singular scene rivetted my attention. The flooring was covered with red carpet, and at the foot of one of the pillars, with a sentry of the Guards standing at ease close by, was a party consisting of two peeresses, arrayed in their coronets and robes, and some other ladies, sitting on the floor picnic fashion, two peers, with their robes tucked up under their arms, also wearing their coronets, a gentleman belonging to the suite of the Austrian Embassy, and an English General, all in an apparently ravenous condition, as they passed their refreshments and flasks about to one another with great satisfaction and enjoyment, and an abnegation of ceremony as they put their bottles to their lips in turn, the absence of wine glasses not troubling their minds in the least degree. Many other parties of a similar description were spotted about whilst waiting for their carriages.

Having seen all I could, I began to think of getting away; and as there was no other means of doing so than by boldly facing the huge crowd which seemed so densely packed that to get through it was an impossibility, I and my comrades took the young ladies we had brought under our care; and, after an hour and a half's perseverance and patience, managed to reach Charing Cross, having met with nothing but civility, good-temper, and humorous "chaffing" on our way.

STUTTGART.—Sig. Verdi's opera of Aida is to be produced for the first time at the Theatre Royal on the King's birthday, the 6th March. Mad. Shröder-Hanfstaengl will sustain the part of the heroine. The next operatic novelty will then be Enzio von Hohenstaufen, libretto by Herr A. B. Dulk, and music by Herr J. J. Abert.

MR J. F. BARNETT'S LAY OF THE LAST MINSTREL.

(From the "Sussex Daily News," February 17.)

The sixth concert of Mr Kuhe's Festival, which took place in the Dome on Tuesday evening, February 16, before a large and fashionable audience, was rendered more than ordinarily interesting by the performance, for the first time in Brighton, of Mr J. F. Barnett's descriptive music to Sir Walter Scott's "Lay of the Last Minstrel." This piece, which was written for and produced at the Triennial Musical Festival at Liverpool last year, places its composer one step higher in the ranks of contemporary musicians, and establishes his position among the small but gradually increasing band of English composers, whose works are a complete refutation to the sneers from foreign quarters at the unmusicalness of our country. It is worthy of the composer of the Raising of Lazarus, The Ancient Mariner, and Paradise and the Peri, and proves how deeply and successfully he has studied orchestral writing, and how skilful he is in extracting the best effects from each instrument without resorting to any of the tricks which so many "popular" composers are prone to, and upon which their reputation is principally based. Like many of the productions of the living school of composers, Mr Barnett has taken a "poetic basis" for his work, and has chosen to illustrate the work of another rather than create and paint his own picture; a course which makes the sister arts more than ever dependent upon each other, without either, however, sacrificing its characteristics or individuality. In the "argument" of his composition, Mr Barnett describes the first movement, which he names "Fair Melrose" (larghetto), as "an elegy on that venerable building," his idea being to illustrate "the feelings of one who, visiting the Abbey 'by pale moonlight,' at the sight of the touching relics of a past age, gives vent to his mournful feelings in a strain such as that suggested by the solo from all the violoncelli." He calls up in his imagination "the chants of the monks of old, like the sound of distant church music," the orchestra, to produce the last effect, being aided by the pedal notes of the organ, which wonderfully improve and vivify the effect. From this mournful picture of the past, the composer turns to a romance, Lady Margaret and the Knight being selected as the subject for this episode, and the movement being described "as a song, or rather a duet without words for orchestra; the first voice being represented by the violins, and the second by the viola and afterwards by the violoncello. A few bars of symphony lead to a theme given out cantabile by the first violins, accompanied by pizzicato chords of a harp-like character. This is answered by a solo for all the violas; an instrument which is too rarely heard as a solo effect, but whose invaluable qualities in the orchestra cannot be over-estimated." The third movement, the subject of which is the Elfin page, manifestly suggested a scherzo, and Mr Barnett has done his best to write something of which neither Weber nor Mendelssohn need have been ashamed. It is quaint, full of tricks and mischief, and so charmingly and delicately scored that the ears must be very dull indeed which could not detect its beauty; but both at Liverpool and Brighton its merits were spontaneously recognized, and it was encored not less enthusiastically last evening than it was last October. The final movement is devoted to the rejoicings at the triumph of Lord Cranstoun over Richard Musgrave, and is worked out at greater length than any of the preceding, the brass instruments and the whole power of the orchestra being brought into play. The opening and chief melody is vivacious and tuneful, and is assigned to the wind instruments, the strings accompanying, the whole being brought to a spirited and effective conclusion, without, however, any straining; for throughout the composer has written well within himself, and the listener is impressed with the idea that there is more power in him if he cares but to exert it. It is gratifying to see that there are composers amongst us who are content to study in the best schools, and honestly and legitimately strive to write music which shall be truthful and natural, and altogether removed from the clap-trap which French and Italian composers are turning out in such quantities. Mr Barnett himself conducted his work, and had the pleasure of observing how much his latest work was admired, and of receiving the warmest encouragement to persevere in the line which he has struck out for himself. He was unanimously recalled at the close of his work, which was performed by the band in a manner which only calls for praise.

ROYAL ALBERT HALL CONCERTS.

The second concert of the Amateur Orchestral Society was dedicated, as is the rule of the body, to a good work—the Royal Alfred Aged Merchant Seamen's Institute being, upon this occasion, the object of assistance, and the more appropriate, perhaps, as the Duke of Edinburgh is the president of the charity in question. The attendance was not only fashionable, in the best and most brilliant sense of the word, but was also considerable, from which it may be inferred that the beneficent purposes in view were satisfactorily realized. The instrumentalists, among whom the Duke took his usual place, played with their accustomed care and attention, and their delivery of Beethoven's eighth symphony, the introduction to the third act of Lohengrin and the overtures to the Cheval de Bronze and the Ambassadrice, presented many creditable points, betokening the value of the discipline they are experiencing at the hands of their leader, Mr H. Enthoven, and their conductor, Mr George Mount. The society is fortunate in its amateur vocalists. At the former concert a pupil of Mr Randegger, Miss Fanny Brough, a mezzo-soprano, made her debût, and, despite her obvious nervousness, exhibited an amount of practical accomplishment, which, unquestionably, would soon make her a reputation were public life her aim. On Saturday night we had a Miss Robertson (another pupil of the same distinguished teacher), who has, it is said, been singing with considerable éclat in the west of England, on behalf of numerous charitable undertakings. The good words spoken of her do not appear to have been undeserved, for she has a soprano voice of high range and of excellent quality, and a facility of execution which enables her to attack florid music with a skill little short of professional in its results. She gave favourable examples of her ability in Donizetti's "O luce di quest' anima," and Randegger's "Bird of the spring time," which, in both cases, and particularly in the latter, in which she was encored, revealed her undoubted vocal skill, and brought down very genuine and prolonged applause. Mr C. E. M'Cheane has been heard before at these concerts, and in "Tom Bowling" was heard again with all the satisfaction that a tenor singer of taste and feeling never fails to engender. Upon being encored he substituted "The Letter" of Arthur Sullivan. Captain Carlyon-Simmons revived a charming ballad, of "The Thorn" pattern, by the late G. F. Harris, called "Did ye see the red rose?"; and Mr W. Ross, R. E., contributed a pair of songs by Schumann, and a spirited aria from a cantata by W. Walter Austin. The part-music included agreeable interpretations of Verdi's quartet from Rigoletto, "Un dì, si ben," and Costa's well-known "Ecco quel fiero istante." The first section of the programme was graced with a violin solo, Ernst's "Reverie," played with masterly skill by Mr H. Enthoven. Mr Randegger accompanied Miss Robertson in her two solo performances. D. H. H.

THE LONDON WAGNER SOCIETY.

Mr Dannreuther has addressed the following to a contemporary, in answer to some remarks upon the above subject:—

"(To the Editor of the 'Musical Standard.')

"SIR,—In your last number you state that the Monthly Musical Record, 'which should know,' speaks of the London Wagner Society as 'now defunct.'

"Allow me to say that there is not the smallest need of an obituary notice as yet. We shall not resume the orchestral concerts, as one of our objects—that of drawing attention to Wagner's music—is attained; but our other and main object—that of sending money to Bayreuth—will continue in force until Der Ring des Nibelungen has actually been performed there. And if we go on as we have begun, the financial committee at Bayreuth will some day be able to give a good account of us. I have the honour to be, Sir, truly yours,

"12, Orme Square, January 25th, 1875." "EDWARD DANNREUTHER.

BRESLAU.—Herr Theodor Wachtel has been singing at the Stadt-theater. He is announced to appear in Lohengrin.—Die Fledermaus of Herr Johann Strauss has been produced and well received at the Lobe-theater.—The principal features at the last Soirée for Chamber-Music given by the Orchestral Union, were the stringed Trio Serenade, Op. 8, of Beethoven, and Hummel's Septet. Herr B. Scholz, also, performed two pianoforte pieces of his own composition, from Op. 40.

MUSIC IN MANCHESTER.

(From our Correspondent.)

Sterndale Bennett's G minor symphony, which was played for the first time in Manchester, at Mr Hallé's last concert, was, I need scarcely tell you, followed with unusual interest. It was splendidly played, and seldom did a work of this character produce so decidedly favourable an impression on a first hearing. Every movement was heartily applauded, and there was a disposition to encore the minuetto and the trio—the latter of these was given with most gratifying taste and accuracy by the brass instruments. Of the symphony itself I will not say a word; I will add nothing to the admirable notices given recently in your columns.

In no memorial notice of the lamented Sterndale Bennett have I seen any reference to what I believe was his only appearance on a London stage. Yet, during the time he was a pupil at the Royal Academy, he did actually take the part of Cherubino in Mozart's Nozze di Figaro, in the concert-room of Her Majesty's Theatre, which was fitted up as a theatre for the occasion. All the performers were pupils and members of the Academy; and Mr C. A. Seymour, who for many years has been the leader of the Manchester orchestras, was the leader of the orchestra at this interesting production of Mozart's masterpiece. It must have been somewhere about 1830 or 1831, and a London newspaper, in noticing the performance, spoke of "Master Bennett's little pipe." It will certainly not surprise the lovers of Sterndale Bennett's unrivalled lyrics to learn that he had himself been a trained singer. Even great composers have made the mistake, which Bennett always avoided, of writing music for the voice only suitable for an instrument.

The concert referred to above was in other respects memorable. Herr Joachim played Beethoven's violin concerto in his own imperial style, satisfying, and more than satisfying, the most exacting critics. In the second part Herr Joachim and Herr Straus played a concerto by Bach, with the orchestra, and an unaccompanied duet by Spohr. Anything finer than these displays could not well be imagined. Madame Néruda had been announced to appear, but she had been suddenly summoned to Brünn, in Moravia, in consequence of the illness of her father. Mr Hallé played a Bach selection, which delighted everybody; and, possibly, somebody was delighted by the orchestral rhapsodie of Raff, heard for the first time. Mdlle Sophie Löwe, the singer of the evening, is not a great artist, nor can she boast of a fine voice; but, if grace of manner and other attractions were universally accepted as compensation, Mdlle Löwe would be a universal favourite. If I were not writing to so dignified a journal as the Musical World, I might go so far as to say that, in looking at Mdlle Löwe, critics forget to listen.

At the Concert Hall on Monday, Herr Wilhelmj made his first appearance this season—since 1868, indeed, I believe. His marvellous execution, and, above all, his pre-eminently splendid tone, excited general astonishment and delight, but, as an intellectual player, he cannot be placed side by side with Herr Joachim. He played Mendelssohn's Concerto, a Romance of his own composition, and two Paraphrases of Chopin. Sterndale Bennett's lovely Naïades overture, Rietz's noble overture in A, two movements of Beethoven's No. 1 Symphony, and Rossini's Siege of Corinth overture, were the orchestral selections. Mr Santley and Mr Welbye Wallace were the singers, the latter a débutant, who did not create a profound impression. Mr Santley sang superbly, and his delivery of Wagner's "O star of eve" created a great sensation; he also revived a remarkably fine scena from I Briganti, of Mercadante, which he sang with consummate finish and skill.

Mr de Jong's extra benefit concert attracted a large audience on Saturday evening. Miss Edith Wynne, Miss Blanche Cole, and other prominent artists appeared.

Mr Frederick Unyer's third classical chamber concert was given at the Town Hall, last night. The programme included Mozart's string Trio, Op. 19, in E flat; Schubert's Pianoforte Fantasia in C major; Mendelssohn's Duet, Op. 58, in D, for pianoforte and violoncello; and Schumann's Quartet, for pianoforte and strings, Op. 47, in E flat. The executants, Messrs Unyer, Baneskelles, Speelman, and Van Biene, all distinguished themselves; and we can give no higher praise to M. Van Biene's playing than by saying that it was not unworthy to be compared to that of the prince of violoncellists, Signor Piatti himself.

I have said nothing hitherto about the pantomime music; but the charming melodies and graceful part-songs by Mr Alfred Cellier, in the Christmas pantomime, are quite above the average of compositions of the kind; and there is also some very clever music by Mr A. Plumpton, in the pantomime at the Theatre Royal.

To-morrow night the Creation will be given, under Mr Hallé's direction, with Mdme Lemmens-Sherrington, Mr Nelson Varley, and Mr Whitney, as the principal singers; and we are looking forward with interest to a performance of Max Bruch's Odysseus, to be given on the 13th of March, by the St Cecilia Amateur Choral Society, assisted by Mr Santley.

MUSIC AT BOULOGNE-SUR-MER.

(From a Correspondent.)

We have had nothing of particular importance in the musical world here of late, since Reichardt's successful concert.

Scrivaneck, after repeating Gentil Bernard with great success, took her leave on the 6th, playing in Les princesses de la rampe and L'Actrice en voyage, and, since her departure, we have had various comedies and dramas, such as Le roman d'un jeune homme pauvre, Les premiers armes de Richelieu, Les trois chapeaux de Monsieur, &c., played with varied success at the Salle Monsigny. Offenbach's Princesse de Trébizonde has been given twice, more successfully on the second than on the first occasion, and Giroflé-Giroflà is in rehearsal. Les deux Orphelines has also been repeated twice to crowded houses.

Apropos of musical matters, I may mention the reception of two handsome bronze medals at the Museum here, forwarded by M. Marcotte de Quivières, Director of the French Mint. The first was struck in memory of Cherubini, and bears on the reverse side to the excellent medallion of the great musician the following inscription:—

"Né a Florence, 8 Septembre, 1760, Démophon, Medée, Lodoïska, Deux Journées, Achille à Seyros, Faniska, Les Abencerrages, Ali Baba, etc., Messe de Requiem, Messe du sacre.—Surintendant de la Musique du Roi, Directeur du Conservatoire, 1822-1842, Membre de l'Institut, Commandeur de la Legion d'Honneur. Mort à Paris, 15 Mars, 1842."

The medallion is by Oudine. The second, in memory of Francois Adrien Boieldieu, by Legrange, après Dantan:—

"Né a Rouen, le 15 Decembre, 1775, Professeur au Conservatoire, Chevalier de la Legion d'Honneur, Membre de l'Institut.—La famille suisse, Beniowsky, Le Calife de Bagdad, Ma tante Aurore, Jean de Paris, Le nouveau Seigneur, Le petit Chaperon rouge, Les voitures versées, La Dame Blanche, Les deux nuits. Mort à Jarcy près Grosbois, le 8 October, 1844."

I suppose you are aware that there is to be un Concours de Musique Internationale during the coming summer at Rouen, to celebrate the centenary of Boieldieu's birth?

Lent makes everything very dull, and the weather suggests firesides at home. Micarème, however, our mid-Lent Thursday, is approaching, and on that sort of safety-valve day for the pent-up feelings of the would-be joyful, numbers of amusements and innumerable balls are being talked of. X. T. R.

P. S.—The young woman who was so successfully treated by music for hysteria, some eight months ago, is perfectly well, and gaining her living by needlework. She is an excellent workwoman, and several ladies give her as much as she can do. She has never had a relapse since May 6, 1874, when the music was applied—or, rather, "taken as before."

DANTZIG.—Madlle Orgéni and Herr Erdmann are playing a short starring engagement at the theatre here. The opera selected for their first appearance was Il Trovatore.

FLORENCE.—At a public prize distribution of the Florentine Institution, and, in presence of the Municipal authorities, the band of the National Guards performed Mr Goldberg's Triumphal March. It will be remembered that this march was first played when the Italian troops entered Rome, after the French troops had left the Eternal City. Mr Goldberg, having dedicated his Triumphal March to the King of Italy, received on that occasion, in acknowledgment from His Majesty, a highly flattering letter, thanking Mr Goldberg in most gracious terms for his patriotic sentiments which had inspired him to compose his Triumphal March.

LONDON BALLAD CONCERTS.

The present series of the London Ballad Concerts has come to its close, and Mr John Boosey can look back on a successful season. The concert-hall has always been very well filled with what the French call "La crême de la societé," and the novelties produced were, almost without exception, very favourably received. The success of the London Ballad Concerts is chiefly due to the superior spirit in which this popular style of entertainment has been conducted, and was particularly noticeable in the concert of Wednesday evening—the last of the season. The attendance was very large, considering the unfavourable weather, and the programme consisted of some of our standard ballads. The greatest successes were Mr Santley's and Mr Lloyd's. The former gentleman substituted for the "encore" gained by his splendid singing of the "Leather Bottel," Hatton's "To Anthea," and, on being encored in the "Vicar of Bray," he repeated the last verses, and, on his recall, gave "Polly." Mr Edward Lloyd sang Sullivan's "Once Again," besides the pieces put down for him, and repeated Balfe's "Come into the garden, Maud." Madame Lemmens-Sherrington was, unfortunately, not in good voice, and therefore Sir Julius Benedict's new song, "Love's Appeal"—a bravura composition—could not fairly be judged. Miss Edith Wynne was encored in Cowen's "It was a dream." Miss Antoinette Sterling sang some ballads—Barnby's "When the tide comes in," and "Home, sweet home." Mr Sydney Smith played his own pianoforte solos, "Air Irlandais" and "Le jet d'eau," in excellent style, and to the evident satisfaction of the audience. Amongst the admired features of the programme were the performances of the "London Vocal Union, from St Paul's," under Mr Frederick Walker's direction. The ensemble singing of these gentlemen is perfect. Praise is also due to them for their selection of pieces.—SIGMUND MENKES.

MUSIC IN NEW ZEALAND.

(From a Correspondent.)

We have had quite a plethora of music lately. Madame Goddard and party, the Royal English Opera Company, besides concerts innumerable, given by Mrs Palmer (Fanny Carandini), Madame Winter, and the musical societies.

Madame Goddard's reception has been more enthusiastic here than, perhaps, in any other town in the colonies. At her first concert, some hundreds were turned away from the doors, unable to gain admission. However, this is not uncommon anywhere; but there was a cordiality in her reception that seemed to touch her heart considerably, and she readily responded to encores, which she frequently declines to do. Of her playing it is needless to speak. It was as perfect as usual, and the critics scarcely presume to say more than that. Her company is weak, with the exception of Herr Doehler, the violinist; but Madame Goddard requires no support. Her name is sufficient everywhere.

The Opera Company played for a month before Madame Goddard's arrival, and since her departure they have returned for a few nights. Miss Alice May took her benefit on Monday; and, in spite of a wet night, she had a bumper. She appeared for the first time in Christchurch as Marguerite, and the general opinion is that it is her greatest part. Mr Hallam is becoming a favourite. His voice, though light, is nice in quality, and he has the good sense not to force it. Mr Templeton, the baritone, has a fine voice, with which he makes a capital use, and his acting is gentlemanly and free from vulgarity. Mr Vernon has not quite the vocal powers of a great tenor, but he is a graceful and natural actor, and has especially distinguished himself in Myles-Na-Coppaleen. The tout ensemble of Mr Allen's company is excellent, and it deserves the success it has obtained in New Zealand. At the same time it is creditable to the musical taste of so young a country, that they support an entertainment for a year. Miss Alice May is really the pet of the country. No one else has received such lavish praise, presents, and honours. At the conclusion of the present tour the company are likely to go to India, under the agentship of Signor Biscaccianti, who prognosticates a decided success. In no country is talent more appreciated than in India.

MUSICAL CRITICISM.

Writing to Dwight's Journal of Music about a matter of persona interest, an American pianist, Mr B. D. Allen, goes on to say:—

"Now that I have pen in hand, may I give expression to a thought or two, bearing upon the general subject of musical criticism, without reference to special cases? I believe in the independence of the critic; that, excluding purely personal considerations, he should labour for the advancement of the art. With this end in view, he may adopt, as his standard, perfection; condemning all according to the degree in which they fail of this. The result will probably be that none can wholly bear the test, while most will fall far short of it. Those who seek to act as conservators of the public taste, by the organization of an orchestra, for instance, or, in small cities, by the organization of a choir for the production of rare choral works, will find their efforts decried, without any consideration of peculiar circumstances which may limit the number of rehearsals or otherwise impair the efficiency of their work. In such cases, does not the critic retard art to the extent to which he discourages and represses the efforts of those who would be its promoters? Many a singer of ability would be willing to give time, study, and unrecompensed effort for the sake of helping on the good cause, who would shrink from exposing his reputation to the assaults of ungenerous criticism. Where such prevails, the community itself, as well as art, is the loser. Is not the needed criticism in such cases that which shall build up (edify), not that which shall tear down and destroy?

"A point for the artist's consideration is this; that, as the late critic of the London Athenæum has expressed it, a quill in a man's hand 'does not give him wings to his shoulders, and convert him into a chartered angel, whose name must be spoken with dread as soon as ever his praise or blame appears in the journal.' As one emerges from a state of pupilage, he will need less and less the verdict of the outside public to assure him of his position in the kingdom of art. He, who, after every performance, must rush from the concert-hall to inquire of the dispersing throng whether he did well, had better not be too hasty in dismissing his teacher. But those who walk in artistic freedom know when they have done well, though the world may disparage. They know, too, when they have done ill, though the world may extol. In striving to reach this position should we not all remember, that the criticism which does us good is friendly, even though it be severe.

MDME GODDARD IN CALIFORNIA.

Mdme Arabella Goddard, who arrived on the Cyphrenes, Saturday night (January 30), has been in the Australian Colonies during part of the past year, but brings the most flattering endorsements from the great London journals, and testimonials of the London public's appreciation. The Times of February 12th, 1873, says:—"From her first achievements, at the concert of the Quartette Association, when she played from memory the long, elaborate, and, to nineteen pianists out of twenty, almost impracticable sonata of Beethoven in B flat, Op. 106, to her more recent exhibitions in public, she has only to look back to an uninterrupted series of triumphs." Mdme Goddard will commence her series of concerts early next week, in either Pacific Hall or Platt's Hall.—San Francisco Journal, February 1st.

A CORRECTION.

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

SIR,—In the Athenæum of last Saturday appears the following statement:—

"The death of Sir W. Sterndale Bennett has left two posts of honour, if not of profit, open, namely, the Principal of the Royal Academy of Music, and the musical professorship of Cambridge. The committee of management, it seems, has elected Mr G. A. Macfarren; but the validity of the nomination is disputed on the ground that the electoral power rests with the directors, who wish to appoint Mr Sullivan."

Will you allow me, through your columns, to declare on the authority of Mr Gill, the secretary of the Royal Academy of Music, that there is not a shadow of truth in the above, and that its foundation rests entirely in the imagination of the writer of the paragraph.

I must, also, call attention to the obvious purport of his remarks further on, when he gives the names of several of the most distinguished musicians as forming the committee of management, and states that the board of directors is composed chiefly of "aristocratic amateurs."—I have the honour to be, sir, your obedient servant,

8, Albert Mansions, S. W., ARTHUR SULLIVAN.

The Musical World,

LONDON, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 27, 1875.

IN another column appears an extract from a letter addressed to Dwight's Journal of Music, by an American artist, who had something to grumble at. The object of his grumbling was an unkind critic, and between him and critics in general lay but a short and easy step. We are glad the artist took it. As a rule, when offended performers write to editors, they make themselves ridiculous; but our American friend appeared in the character of a sensible and reasonable man. Whether he was right or wrong about the special matter of which he complained, we cannot tell. But these are pertinent and weighty remarks:—

"I believe in the independence of the critic; that, excluding purely personal considerations, he should labour for the advancement of the art. With this end in view, he may adopt, as his standard, perfection; condemning all according to the degree in which they fail of this. The result will probably be that none can wholly bear the test, while most will fall far short of it. Those who seek to act as conservators of the public taste, by the organization of an orchestra, for instance, or, in small cities, by the organization of a choir for the production of rare choral works, will find their efforts decried, without any consideration of peculiar circumstances which may limit the number of rehearsals or otherwise impair the efficiency of their work. In such cases, does not the critic retard art to the extent to which he discourages and represses the efforts of those who would be its promoters? Many a singer of ability would be willing to give time, study, and unrecompensed effort for the sake of helping on the good cause, who would shrink from exposing his reputation to the assaults of ungenerous criticism. Where such prevails, the community itself, as well as art, is the loser. Is not the needed criticism in such cases that which shall build up (edify), not that which shall tear down and destroy?"

How far such observations were called for by the character of American criticism, we do not pretend to judge, nor does it matter as regards the use we shall make of them. They concern the interests of music in England not less, we will venture to say, than in America, because they indicate a danger towards which we are apparently drifting. If common testimony may be believed, there was once a time, not so long ago as the Conquest, when what purported to be musical criticism was neither more nor less than indiscriminate laudation. The critics all wore spectacles couleur de rose, and either through timidity, or for reasons of another kind, kept their intelligent countenances beaming with delight. From one point of view, this was an agreeable state of things. Nobody got into trouble, and everybody enjoyed his share of journalistic "fat." Art languished, of course, in an atmosphere at once so luxurious and enervating; but Art, being impersonal, was of small account, and nobody thought about it. We are not going to defend this state of things. In so far as it belongs to the past, the change is for the better, and that it does, in some degree, belong to the past, few will deny. But, men are ever ready to rush from one extreme to another. The hottest zealot is a pervert; the fiercest enemy he who was once a friend. Perhaps, this general principle explains why musical criticism now-a-days shows a disposition to swing over to the other side of injustice, and offend, not by leniency, but by unreasoning and unfair hostility. At any rate, circumstances make it worth while to enquire whether the first business of a musical critic be to foster art, or to chastise its professors. In the second case, the best course is, as observes the American pianist, to "adopt, as his standard, perfection, condemning all according to the degree in which they fail." On this ground the chastiser is safe, because, as perfection cannot be demonstrated, he may hit out at everybody without exposing his own ignorance. Moreover, plausible but spurious logic may be invented to back up the position. It is easy to say that, as the conservator of art, a critic knows nothing of extraneous circumstances, from which he stands divided by the highest and most imperative obligations. The result may be hard upon those who are merely exponents of art, but it is a necessary consequence of their position, and should be endured as an engine driver endures the roasting of his legs while his teeth are chattering. But if it can be shown that this judgment by the standard of perfection actually bars the progress of art towards the point insisted on, the whole theory tumbles like a house of cards. The test perfection must be abandoned, and our critic, with his head against the arch of heaven, must come down to the very mundane labour of putting his shoulder to a possibly muddy wheel—in other words, when forming judgment upon a thing done, he must stoop to acknowledge the conditions of its doing, and shape his verdict accordingly. After all, this line of action—the only true one, as we believe—is that by which opinion upon most matters is regulated. When a painter holds the pencil between his toes for lack of arms, his deprivation becomes a factor in our estimate of the result. Examples might be multiplied to infinity, but there is no need of them. It falls in with the true idea of justice that a man is worthy of praise or blame, not as he stands with regard to "perfection," but according to the opportunities he has had of becoming perfect.

We wish our musical critics would oftener bear these considerations in mind. To do so, we know, involves some sacrifice. He who blames, by the very act, puts himself above the blamed, and the position is gratifying to self-love. Besides, a course of indiscriminate censure involves many opportunities for the exhibition of that "smartness" which an age of "fast" journalism cherishes; while it also gratifies the cruelty of human nature. With a genuine critic, however, such considerations go for little. Desiring to promote the advance of art, his eye is upon all artistic doings, measuring the result achieved by the means available, and ready to praise honest effort even though it be very far indeed from evolving perfection. To encourage the first steps of a little child is quite as noble as to cheer an athlete; and, if the men who wield the pen of criticism could be got to recognize the fact, a healthier spirit would pervade the musical world.

—o—

AS the question of a Sterndale Bennett memorial in Westminster Abbey is sure to be raised, we cannot do better than direct attention to the excellent proposal recently made, through our columns, by Mr W. H. Cummings. It will be remembered that Mr Cummings advocated the filling in with stained glass of an uncoloured window which lights "Musicians' Corner." Than this nothing could be better. In the first place, the plan would make needless the addition of another stone monument to those which already crowd the Abbey. What monstrosities abound within those venerable walls, and in what degree they disfigure the place, nobody wants to be told. Indeed, the time can hardly be far distant when public opinion will insist upon their removal as an act alike of justice and expediency. The proposed window could not, in any case, give such offence, rather would it heighten the beauty of the interior, and carry one step further those measures of restoration which will in time, let us hope, make amends for centuries of neglect. Every window in the grand old building should be "richly dight," and not that alone, but "storied" also. For the one near which repose Purcell, Blow, Croft, Arnold, and Sterndale Bennett, a splendid opportunity now offers. It may be true that these men need no memorial; but there is something pleasing in the idea that the light of Heaven, entering the Abbey, and falling on their graves, will be stained with the hues in which gratitude and admiration have commemorated their lives. We sincerely trust that the "Musicians' Window" will at once be taken in hand, subject, of course, to the approbation of the Dean and Chapter. For ourselves, we shall be glad to receive communications on the subject with a view to this result.

The Allmanyuka.

From ("Another World.")

"Improve Nature's gifts, and with her elements form new compounds . . . . .
"Were man's faculties given that they should slumber?"

Nothing engaged my attention more than the health of my people. I had satisfied myself that the most virulent diseases took their development from minute, nay, almost imperceptible causes.

As I had determined to find out the germs of faults in children, which, when neglected, led to confirmed vices in the adult; so I was determined to discover disease in its incipience, and, wherever possible, remove the exciting cause.

I have already referred to the creation of a new fruit-vegetable, as one of the subjects of a series of pictures in my summer palace. I will now relate to you some facts regarding the production of the fruit, the offspring of my anxiety for the health of the people.

In the early part of my reign, before the means had been discovered for detecting the incipient germs of disease, the people were afflicted by the return of a painful malady, with which they had often been afflicted before. It was attended with irritation of the intestines, and carried the sufferer off rapidly; for, although all the doctors were familiar with the symptoms, none of them had been able to discover the cause of the disease, or its cure.

I remarked that the children at the colleges were not attacked by this disease, and therefore thought that it had probably originated in something used by adults and not by the young.

The truth of my hypothesis was soon tested. A person of robust frame, whom I much esteemed, died suddenly of the malady. I entreated his friends, in the interest of humanity, to allow his body to be examined.

The people at this period indulged in the use of sauces, seasoned with strong stimulating spices. These were excluded from colleges, and consequently were used by adults only.

I communicated my opinion to the doctors: viz., that, in the the case they were about to examine, it would be found that those burning condiments had inflamed the intestines, and impeded nature in the discharge of her functions. My impressions were correct. With the aid of the electric microscope upwards of forty minute ulcers, highly inflamed, were discovered in the intestines of the deceased, and in each of those ulcers were seen several minute grains of some very hot condiments much in use, which had affected the inner membrane, generated the ulcers, and caused a hasty but painful death.

Assured of the baneful effect of the condiments, I determined to forbid their use, though I knew this would be a serious infliction on the people, inasmuch as the extreme heat of our climate made stimulants necessary. The condiments were much liked, and amongst all the many fruits and vegetables we possessed there were none that could be used as substitutes.

On forbidding their use, I made known publicly the discovery that had been made, every particular being clearly explained, that the people might be convinced that I was acting for their good.

In obedience to my orders, the spices were collected from every quarter, and placed in large warehouses secured under lock. The "bolts" were delivered to the kings, who were astonished at the rapidity with which I had obtained obedience to a decree depriving all of what had become a daily want.

OCCASIONAL NOTES.

Mr Gye is reported by the Ménestrel to have secured the exclusive right of representing Gounod's Roméo et Juliette in England.

A ninth volume of the Biographie Universelle des Musiciens is being prepared by M. Arthur Pougin. While the publishers are about it, they may as well re-write a good many of M. Fétis's biographical articles, and supply some omissions, notably those which do so much injustice to English composers.

The first performance of Lohengrin, at the Scala, Milan, brought in 10,982 lire; the first performance of Aida, 13,314; the first performance of Sig. Ponchielli's Lituani, 13,636; the first performance of Sig. Boito's Mefistofele, 13,590; and the first performance of Sig. Marchetti's Gustavo Wasa, 6,748.

There are at present twenty-two theatres open in Paris, namely:—the Opera, the Opéra-Comique, the Théâtre Français, the Odéon, the Châtelet, the Théâtre-Lyrique-Dramatique, the Vaudeville, the Variétés, the Gymnase, the Gaité, the Palais-Royal, the Bouffes Parisiens, the Porte St Martin, the Renaissance, the Folies-Dramatiques, the Ambigu-Comique, the Château d'Eau, the Cluny, the Théâtre des Arts, the Déjazet, the Folies-Marigny, and the Athenée.

According to a letter in the Italian paper, Il Secolo, the pecuniary affairs of the Imperial Operahouse, Vienna, are not in a very flourishing state. The deficit has amounted, in a short time, to the by no means inconsiderable sum of 300,000 florins, or about £30,000 sterling. Among other reasons assigned for this deficit are the enormous nightly expenses, the great number of persons employed in the administrative department, and the high prices, which keep away the public.

Catania.—Mdlle Ida Corani has had a brilliant success in the Sonnambula, according to the local journals. Il Monitore says—"With regard to the performance, we must say that the warmest applause fell to the share of Signorina Ida Corani, who, as the Swiss maid, was admirable. She sang the air of the first act, the duet with the tenor, and the rondo finale, with artistic finish, and throughout the opera received quite an ovation from a crowded house. She must have devoted long and patient study to her art before she could have acquired the complete command she possesses over her voice, which has evidently been cultivated in the purest school. The audience were enthusiastic, and recalled Mdlle Corani several times to receive well-merited applause."

Milan.—A little more animation has just been infused into matters operatic here. After innumerable delays and postponements, which, like the increase of appetite whereto Hamlet referred, seemed to grow by what they fed on, the new opera, Gustavo Wasa, by Sig. Filippo Marchetti, has at length been brought out at the Scala. Opinion is much divided as to its merits, both among the critics and the public. One person says it was a failure. Another, with equal confidence, asserts it to have been a success. "In medio tutissimus ibis" Horace wrote some time ago. Perhaps the truth lies between the two verdicts just cited. One thing is pretty certain. The libretto is not well adapted for music. It is dull, gloomy, and monotonous, offering the composer few opportunities of introducing a little musical sunshine to cheer up the prevailing shadow. Among the pieces which pleased most, in the first act, was the love duet between the tenor and the soprano, though it reminds one too much of the same composer's Ruy Blas. In fact, this charge has been brought against the whole opera, and some ill-natured members of the orchestra went so far as to affirm that "Gustavo Wasa was a cupful of Ruy Blas in a pailful of water." In the second act, the audience bestowed the greatest amount of applause on the recitative of the barytone; the last part of the duet between the barytone and the soprano; the grand air sung by Signora Mariani as Romilia; and the romance of the bass. The most striking portions of the third act were a duet between the tenor and the bass; and Romilia's mad scene. Almost the only praiseworthy feature in the fourth act was the death of Romilia, to which full justice was done by Signora Mariani, who especially distinguished herself, both by her singing and her acting, throughout the evening. Signori Bolis, Pantaleone, and Maini, also, did all that possibly could be done with the music respectively assigned to them. The chorus was satisfactory; the orchestra, under the practised direction of Sig. Faccio, decidedly good. On the first night, Sig. Marchetti was called on eight times, and, on the second, fourteen, which, for these enthusiastic latitudes, is not much. La Lega, by Sig. Josse, is in rehearsal. It will be followed by Sig. Ponchielli's work, I Lituani corrected and revised by its composer.

CONCERTS VARIOUS.

The Wilton Belgrave Cricket Club gave a vocal and instrumental concert at the Chelsea Vestry Hall, on Monday, February 15th, with the assistance of Mdlle Vittoria de Bono (violinist) and Miss Ada Lester (pianist). In the duet from Guillaume Tell, and the solo, "A Venezia," Mdlle de Bono displayed considerable execution, and she was most ably accompanied by Miss Lester, whose solos, "Dal tuo stellato" and "Irish Diamonds, No. 3," showed her power over the instrument of her predilection. Mrs Fenton, Mdme Vandenbrocke, and Mr Tinney, where the principal vocalists, Mr Jones was the accompanist, and the concert was under the direction of Mr Woods.

Athenæum, Camden Town.—An esteemed correspondent writes us word that Miss Lillie Albrecht, who made her second appearance among us on Friday, the 19th inst., succeeded in delighting a large and appreciative audience, who expressed warmly their approbation of the fair young artist's taste and execution, so well evidenced in her performance of Ascher's brilliant arrangement of "Alice," which she gave with delicacy and finish. Miss Albrecht's second piece, Ketterer's "Octave Grand Galop de Concert," was admirably adapted to display the remarkable power of execution she possesses in passages for the left hand, and drew down an unanimous recall, to which the fair young artist responded by giving her own charming réverie, "The Maiden's Tear." We heartily congratulate Miss Albrecht on her thorough command over the instrument of her predilection, and on the artistic style in which she plays the works of modern as well as of classical masters, in both of which she has now been heard to advantage.

Brompton Consumption Hospital.—An entertainment was given to the patients of this institution last week by Mdme Mangold Diehl and Miss Elizabeth Philp, assisted by Messrs Colnaghi, Helmore, and Hepworth. The first part of the programme was devoted to songs, and a pianoforte solo by Mdme Mangold Diehl, which found great favour, and was warmly re-demanded, a success that also attended Miss Philp's rendering of her popular song, "Lillie's Good-Night." The second part was occupied by Sullivan's Cox and Box, for the performance of which a little stage had been erected. Given in costume, capitally acted, and well sung, the spirited piece, with its charming music, seemed quite to raise the suffering spectators into a temporary forgetfulness of their woes, and the genuine laughter and evident satisfaction aroused by each favourite song and well-known "point" must have fully rewarded those whose time and trouble had been given to ensure the success of the evening. We must compliment both Mr Helmore (Cox) and Mr Colnaghi (Box) on their nice discrimination in those farcical scenes, that might so easily be marred by want of tact and experience. Their acting would have done credit to any stage, and their duet singing was especially deserving of praise. Mdme Mangold Diehl accompanied, and the evening ended with a vote of thanks to, and a round of cheers for, the entertainers.—Z.

Sacred Harmonic Society.—The oratorio, last night, was Macfarren's John the Baptist. In the course of the evening, the Dead March from Saul was played as a tribute of respect to the memory of Sterndale Bennett. Particulars in our next.

Royal Albert Hall Concerts.—St David's Day will be celebrated by a Welsh Festival Concert at the Royal Albert Hall, on which occasion the members of the Principality residing in London and the suburbs will have a thoroughly national programme presented to them. Miss Edith Wynne, Miss Lizzie Evans, Miss Marian Williams, Miss Mary Davies, Madame Patey, Mr Edward Lloyd, Mr Ap Herbert and Mr Lewis Thomas are announced as vocalists; Miss Bessie M. Waugh, Mr W. H. Thomas and Mr Brinley Richards presiding at the pianoforte. A Band of Harps, under the direction of Mr John Thomas, will also assist, and the Part-Song Choir of the Royal Albert Hall Choral Society, under Mr Barnby's direction, will contribute Welsh Choruses and Part-Songs. A Popular and Ballad Concert takes place to-night, at the Royal Albert Hall, with Madame Lemmens-Sherrington, Miss Edith Wynne, Miss Antoinette Sterling, Mr Edward Lloyd and Mr Thurley Beale as vocalists.

Berlin.—Negotiations have been renewed between Mad. Mallinger and Herr von Hülsen, the Intendant-General of the Theatres Royal. Such favourable terms have now been offered the lady that she will in all probability accept them. Should she do so, she will cancel as many engagements as she can of those she made under the impression she should cease to belong to the Royal Operahouse. There are some she cannot cancel, and these she will have to fulfil during her annual leave of absence.

PROVINCIAL.

PINNER (Herts).—A concert was given in the Hall, February 22nd, and drew a crowded audience. The vocalists were the Misses Dunsford and Rayner, and Messrs Norton and Ch. J. Bishenden. Miss Dunsford sang to advantage in her solos, especially in "Tell me, my heart;" Mr Norton was also highly successful, and proved himself a good singer; Mr Bishenden was received with great applause on his first appearance, the audience liking his songs so much that they encored "The Outlaw" and "The brave old Oak." The performance was very satisfactory.

LEWISHAM.—The Musical Society gave a concert at the Hall, on February 23; and long before the time for the commencement of the performance the place was filled. Besides the attraction of Mr Ch. J. Bishenden's being engaged, a number of new songs were in the programme, all of which were written expressly for this concert, viz.:—"The Soldier-Boy's Mother," sung by Mr Lines; "A Name," sung by Miss Brewster; and a ballad sung by Mdme Roberti, the name of which was not printed. Mr Spawl sang "The Burial of Sir John Moore," and Mr H. V. Lewis R.A.M., played his new fantasia, "God Bless the Prince of Wales;" Mr Ch. J. Bishenden gave a new anthem, "Victoria," which brought the concert to a finish.

LEICESTER.—Since Mr Elliot Galer has re-modelled, re-decorated, and made an old dingy place a handsome and commodious theatre, there has been no lack of patronage, Mr Galer having proved himself a successful manager in every sense of the word. He has produced opera, opera-bouffe, dramas, Shakespeare's plays, and pantomime—all proving remunerative. Three weeks ago, he produced a new and original farce by R. Clothier, Esq., of which the Era speaks highly. The local newspapers say:—"The house is kept in a continual roar of laughter from the time the curtain rises till the end of the piece, when all the performers are called before the curtain." Mr Charles Matthews played last week for two nights, preceded by the new farce, Our Tom up from Oxford, to crowded houses. We wish Mr Galer all success.

ORSETT (Essex).—The choral society, consisting of about fifty amateurs, gave a concert in the Institute on Thursday evening, January 28, by the kind permission of R. B. Wingfield Baker, Esq. The first part consisted of excerpts from Mendelssohn's St Paul and Elijah, and Handel's Messiah, interpreted by Mrs Littlehales, Mrs Rea Corbet, Mrs S. Squier, Miss Falcon, Mr Crosthwaite, and the Rev. A. E. Robinson. The second part was miscellaneous, in which Miss Lucila Falcon and her sister, the Rev. E. C. Lethbridge, and the choral society took part. All "went" to the evident satisfaction of the audience, thanks to the energy and tact displayed by Mr H. Regaldi, of the Royal Academy of Music, London, who conducted. The accompanists of the vocal pieces, on the pianoforte, were Miss Bloomfield and Mr S. Noble.

ROMFORD.—The South Essex Choral Society gave a concert in the Corn Exchange on Thursday evening, February 4th, the first part of which consisted of an instrumental piece for the pianoforte à quatre mains, played by Messrs A. H. and W. W. Brown; Mendelssohn's "Hear my prayer" (soprano solo by Mrs Emily Hope), and a selection from Elijah, sung by the Misses Emily and Alice Hope, Mrs Haynes, Miss Josephine Fry, Miss Roper, the Revs J. W. and G. P. Bennett, Messrs Crosthwaite, Pemberton and Fry; and the second part, of a miscellaneous collection of vocal pieces given by the choir and Mr G. Crosthwaite, two violin solos by Mr T. Sergeant, and a pianoforte duet by the Messrs Brown. The concert was well patronized, and the audience must have been pleased with the performance. Mr H. Regaldi, of the Royal Academy of Music, was the conductor, and the post could not have been placed in abler hands.

FOLKESTONE.—The fifth meeting in connection with the Catch Club was held with Mr Ald. Thomas Caister in the chair. There was a very large attendance. Excellent talent had been engaged for the occasion in Mr and Mrs Offord. The music was under the management of Mr G. Nicholson in the place of Mr Jarrett, who was prevented from attending. Mrs Offord acquitted herself particularly well in the "Fairy Glen" and "Home to the Mountain;" and in the second part she was enthusiastically encored in each of her songs, "Auld Robin Gray," and "The harp that once through Tara's halls." Mr Offord sang some sea songs in very fine style, especially the song dedicated to Samuel Plimsoll, and "Let me like a soldier fall." Mr Mathews, who sang "Not twice," "Please to knock and ring," and "The girl with a will," met with much favour from the audience. Mr Nicholson, during the evening, gave two solos on the flute, which were beautifully played, and one was rapturously encored.

HARROW-ON-THE-HILL.—The seventh "Thursday Popular Concert" introduced us to Brahms' sextett, Op. 18, and Handel's concerto for string instruments, the first creating satisfaction even to those of the audience who reluctantly accept the works of new composers. The difficult task, as regards conception and technique, was in the able hands of our regular quartett—Messrs Otto Peiniger, Szczepanowski, Amor, Ould, Webb and Pettit, who, afterwards, with some other artists, executed Handel's solo-concerto with all the care which is due to the dear old master. Between Mendelssohn's "O rest in the Lord," sung by Miss Dones, and Handel's "Honour and arms," sung by Mr Pyatt, Mr Ould played with beautiful tone a Romanza for violoncello, by Goltermann, and was, like the solo singers, heartily applauded. The concert finished with some well chosen English ballads, and we left the hall once more with a high feeling of gratitude to Messrs Farmer and Otto Peiniger who take so much pains in arranging these concerts.

DUNDEE.—Last night the orchestral concerts in Dundee, for this season, terminated. The audience seemed to be rather larger than usual, though it was not such as either the fame of the orchestra or the superior excellence of the programme deserved. This concert was, perhaps, the best—as it certainly was in our view the most interesting—of the short series. The chief orchestral effort was Mendelssohn's fine symphony in A minor, which, on fairly reliable grounds, it is said he once called his "Scotch symphony." The work next in importance produced was Sir William Sterndale Bennett's entrancing Fantasia Overture, Paradise and the Peri—one of the very finest musical conceptions ever penned by any composer. Professor Oakeley's newly-scored "Funeral March" and his "Edinburgh March" were excellent performances. The composer's own direction of them was most efficient, and throughout intelligible. The "Funeral March" is a well made composition in C minor. The trio particularly fell on the ear last night with pleasure. An agreeable surprise was that of the trumpets introduced on the bright tonic major triad towards the close of the march. The passages for the 'cellos were also excellent features in the effect. The composer has himself indicated the shades of feeling sought to be expressed in this march, and, with his words before the eye, few could fail to appreciate the success of his design.—Dundee Advertiser, Feb. 18.

We take the following from the Dundee Courier, anent a recent performance of Randegger's Fridolin in that hyperborean town:—

"In the story of Fridolin, founded on a ballad of Schiller's, Signor Randegger has a theme of intense dramatic interest, which could easily be developed into a first-rate opera. As it is, he has wedded it to music so powerfully and vividly expressive of the situations, so full of natural affinities with the scenes depicted, and so exciting, that the imagination is completely taken captive, and compelled to own the original power, scholarship, and fertility of resource of the composer. The poem affords striking contrast of character, and great diversity and contrast of scene and situation, all of which the music interprets with such force, that, in our opinion, it gets sometimes pushed into the sphere of melodrama. We also venture to think that the scene where Hubert is cast into the furnace, and the Count and Countess arrive in time to save Fridolin from a similar fate, is the climax; and that the work might have concluded quietly with something like the Andante Religioso, as the interest in the story is then exhausted, and the epilogue, although in it all the resources of orchestra, organ, chorus, and soloists are piled up in the most gigantic manner, has, after all, only the weak effect of an anti-climax. Miss Hersee identified herself thoroughly with the part of the Countess, singing her music with all the charm of a pure, sweet soprano voice and good style. If her notes were a little thin occasionally, the great range of compass and trying character of the music must be taken into account. Mr Pearson's fame has travelled before him, but we must own to a little disappointment, for he seemed to be out of voice, probably owing to cold. Little coarsenesses in pronunciation could be detected now and then, and the contrast in changing the registers was sometimes hard and disagreeable, but he seems to be an earnest and painstaking young artist, and with further study will no doubt make his mark. Mr Wadmore sang the baritone music pertaining to the Count with good effect. His interpretation of the air "O, woman, with the pure and guileless face," especially shewed his equally-developed, well-cultivated voice and sympathetic treatment, while in the more dramatic scenes his declamation was true and forcible. In Mr Whitney we have a true bass. He posseses a voice at once deep and powerful, while he sings with the style of a fine artist. His powers were admirably suited in the difficult part of Hubert, whose Iago-like duplicity and hate he pourtrayed with great fidelity. Altogether the caste was an admirable one, and, together with the efforts of the chorus and orchestra, must have satisfied Signor Randegger that pains had been taken to do his fine work all manner of justice. The orchestra, barring an occasional little roughness and unsteadiness, was highly satisfactory, while the choristers exhibited much the same excellences and imperfections which have lately characterized them. Signor Randegger's conducting is masterly, but, if anything, too demonstrative. His whole body is full of music, and vibrates with the effects to be produced. We could, however, spare the rhythmic boot, as there is no part in the score for it, and, although there is 'nothing like leather,' its musical pretensions are still doubtful."

THE LIVERPOOL PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.—On Tuesday, an extraordinary meeting of the members of the society was held, for the purpose of determining upon the future policy of the committee. The past policy has been of an exclusive nature, the use of the Philharmonic Hall having been denied to outside impresarios. This course, however, has resulted in a deficit in the accounts, and, at the annual meeting held about a month ago, a resolution was passed recommending the committee to let the hall for all legitimate musical purposes. The meeting yesterday was called to reconsider this resolution, the committee wishing to have it withdrawn. A very strong feeling was expressed, however, against the exclusive policy of the past, which was severely criticised, and the motion for superseding the resolution was overwhelmed by a large majority. It was stated that Sir Julius Benedict had intimated he would resign if the hall was let to Mr Charles Hallé, on account of the comparisons which would be made; but there was strong dissent from this remark, and a vote of thanks to Sir Julius was adopted.

MUSIC AT COLOGNE.

On the 3rd and 4th of April next will be celebrated a two-fold jubilee, namely: the 25th anniversary of the foundation of the Conservatory of Music—at first called the Rhenish School of Music—and of the uninterrupted connection with it, as director, of Dr Ferdinand Hiller. A brilliant concert will be given at the Gürzenich in honour of the double event.

Speaking of the Gürzenich Concerts, a correspondent of the Berlin Echo says:—

"Of more interesting programmes than those of the present season these concerts have not boasted for a long time, or, perhaps, ever; not one of the performances passed by—and there were seven—at which, besides, of course, due attention being paid to the valuable productions of the older masters, one, or even more compositions of quite recent date did not figure among the pieces executed. Here are the names of the composers thus favoured: Volkmann, Brahms, Lalo, Svensden, Benedict, Grieg, Liszt, Jensen, Rheinberger, and Wagner. Even this short list says, at any rate, something for a town like Cologne, where, not so very many years ago, people could not make up their minds to believe that musicians over the hills and far away could do something, and that by no means so bad, in the way of composition. Whether this satisfactory advance merits, however, enthusiastic praise, or ought simply to be regarded as a matter of duty, is a question for our readers to decide. To mention in detail everything brought forward at the concerts would probably be wearisome. We will select, therefore, the works which imprinted themselves most vividly on our recollection. They are the Symphony in D major by Svensden; the 'Schicksalalied' by Brahms; the 'Fest-Ouverture' by Volkmann; the Overture to Die Sieben Raben, by Rheinberger; the Violin Concerto by Lalo; the Pianoforte Concerto, by Ed. V. Grieg; the grand Symphonic Orchestral Work—called only an Overture in the programme—by G. Jensen (a teacher at the Cologne Conservatory), and the G minor Symphony, an especially fresh and pleasing production, by Benedict of London. Hiller, our Capellmeister, did not, of course, completely forget himself; he contributed to the first, the second, the sixth, and, also, to the eighth concert. As belonging to the section above mentioned of 'the valuable productions of the older masters,' we will cite Beethoven's third and fifth Symphony, and his overture to Coriolan; Gade's Symphony in B flat major, and Schumann's, the Symphony surnamed 'the Rhenish,' in E flat; the grand Mass in D minor by Cherubini; and Overtures by Mozart and Weber. The series of soloists was undisturbed by any failure, special approbation falling to Wilhelmj, Japha, Wieniawski (violin); Kwast, teacher at the Cologne Conservatory, an artist still young but of great promise, Brassin, from Brussels (pianoforte); Mesdes Orgéni, Regan, Radecke, Herren G. Henschel and Schüttky (vocalists)."

CONSTANTINOPLE.—It has been resolved to erect a new operahouse in this capital.

BOLOGNA.—Sig. Arrigo Boito has just completed an Italian version of the book of Glinka's Russian opera, Russlan and Ludmila, which, according to report, will be performed, next autumn, at the Teatro Comunale.

LEIPSIC.—Herren A. Winterberger and F. Stade have been giving at the Central Hall a series of concerts designated Novitäten-Matinéen, or Novelty-Matinées. The programmes have included Pianoforte Trios by Goldmark, Heinrich Hofmann, Saint-Saëns; the Duet-Sonata, Op. 77, by Rheinberger; Pianoforte Pieces by Schulz-Beuthen, A. W. Dreszer, and T. Kirchner, together with songs and other vocal pieces by Winterberger, Ad. Jensen, and R. Franz.

BRUSSELS.—There is now no doubt that M. Félicien David's Perle du Brésil, at the Théâtre Royal de la Monnaie, is an even more decided failure than was at first supposed. It will probably not be given again. Le Bal Masqué, otherwise Un Ballo in Maschera, has afforded Mesdlles Leslino, Salla, M. Devoyod, and other members of M. Campocasso's company, an opportunity of proving that they do not appear to the best advantage in this work of Sig. Verdi's. Le Nozze di Figaro is in active rehearsal, and will be produced soon after La Reine de Chypre, the next novelty.—M. Lecocq's Prés St Gervais was to be produced very shortly at the Alcazar.

DUSSELDORF.—The New Stadttheater is so far advanced towards completion that it will possibly be opened before the end of the present year. Meanwhile, the usual laudable activity is manifested by the manager, Herr Scherbarth, at the old house. Madlle Marie Lehmann, from Cologne, recently appeared, with great success, as Elsa, in Herr R. Wagner's Lohengrin, Mad. Scherbarth, as Ortrud, being equally fortunate in pleasing the audience.—There has been no lack of concerts recently. Among those most worthy of notice may be mentioned that got up for the benefit of the Cornelius Monument to be erected here, and a matinée given by Herr Jules de Swert.

RAFF AND WAGNER IN AMERICA.

Two novelties, Raff's new Symphony and a selection from Wagner's Walkyrie, having been played at a Thomas concert, were thus commented on by Dwight:—

"The new Symphony by that sleepless and voluminous composer Raff, revealed no correspondence, part for part, between its several movements and the sections of its rhymed German motto, which means 'Lived and strove; suffered and fought; died and won.' To be sure, one might feel in the general character of the work as a whole (especially the first movement), as he does in so many of the more earnest, great Symphonic works—notably the C minor of Beethoven—a suggestion of the conflict and the victory of life. This we have, rather weakly and vaguely (with nothing like the conciseness and the fire of Beethoven), in the first allegro, which seemed not unmusical, not of marked originality (of course, speaking from a single hearing). But the Vivace, which succeeds it, is just a freakish, wild fantastic scherzo, àpropos of nothing, surely not of gelitten or gestritten. The Funeral March is by far the most striking movement, and, taken by itself, quite interesting. But the Finale, which we suppose should mean Victory in Death, disappointed every hope of glorious climax, and was wholly uninspiring, tame, prolix, and tedious. (Think of the Finale of the Fifth Symphony!) But your outright Thomas public, as well as ye Thomas "critics," always in duty bound to go by the book, seem ready to reverse the maxim of taking the will for the deed, and measure the intrinsic value of the composition by the splendour and precision of the instrumental execution. Everything is good, in other words, which Thomas plays, and because Thomas plays it. The dances by Brahms did not give us half the pleasure which a good old set of the Strauss waltzes would on any fit occasion.

"Of the new Wagnerian instalment, from the Walkyrie, we may confess we listened to it all with interest and amazement; it stirred up some new sensations, which it would be hopeless to define. Wotan (who is a sort of Scandinavian Jove, ruler of all the world except himself), has condemned his beautiful daughter, Brunhilde, to the condition of a mortal, leaving her in deep sleep, and doomed to marry the first man who awakens her. Touched with a little human pity, notwithstanding, he takes leave of her, and sings his 'Abschied,' a strain not without tender feeling, but amidst the wildest hurricane of orchestral accompaniment (meaning the struggle between the tyrant and the father in one breast?). The 'Fire Charm,' which follows, where the god calls fire out of the rocks to form a protecting ring about Brunhilde, is certainly a vivid, most ingenious piece of descriptive instrumental music, producing pleasurable surprise, like any other clever novelty in fireworks."

WAIFS.

Mdlle Ida Corani has been singing the part of Amina (La Sonnambula) with great success, in Catania.

Mdlle Belocca, M. Maurice Strakosch's latest protégé, is having great success in the French provinces.

Mr J. P. Clarke, the writer of some popular dance music, has joined the Scots Fusilier Guards as Band-master.

Preparations are being made for the transference of Donizetti's remains to the tomb erected for them in Bergamo Cathedral.

Mr Carl Rosa has returned from Italy, where he made several valuable engagements for his coming English Opera campaign.

The much talked of Odysseus of Max Bruch is about to be introduced at one of the famous Manchester concerts, conducted by Mr Hallé.

In the list of Mr Gye's engagements for the ensuing season will be found the name of Miss Thalberg, only daughter of the late renowned pianist.

The first concert of the Schubert Society (forty-fifth since its formation) took place on Wednesday evening. Particulars in our next number.

The death is announced, in Paris, of Herr Damcke, author of several important works, among them an oratorio, Deborah, and Kætchen von Heilbronn, an opera.

The composition class of the late Sir Sterndale Bennett, at the Royal Academy of Music, is now confided to Mr Arthur Sullivan—once his pupil. Good!

Mr Arthur Sullivan is writing an opéra bouffe, with Mr Gilbert as his literary collaborateur. It need hardly be said that from such a co-operation great things will be expected.

A Liverpool paper gives a notice of Liszt's Concerto "in Z flat." It is only a revival of the old Christy joke, of the tenor who went up to "Q" in—a threepenny boat.—Figaro.

Mdlle Albani is on her way from the United States to the Old Country.

A "medium" in America has been conversing with the ghost of Beethoven. Perhaps he can induce the old Bonn musician to give us from spirit-land that tenth Symphony.—Figaro.

Liszt has gone to Pesth to take charge of the new Conservatoire there. His servant ran off, the other day, with the master's jewels, &c., but was caught soon after and made to disgorge.

Mr Arthur Pougin is engaged in supplementing a ninth volume of the Biographie universelle des Musiciens, thus putting the seal on the laborious and remarkable compilation of the late M. Fétis.

The charming little operetta, The Vivandière, written by Wellington Guernsey, and composed by Auguste Pilati, was performed for the 48th time at the Royal Italian Opera, Covent Garden, on Saturday last.

In an article on the last Crystal Palace Concert, àpropos of the pianoforte concerto of Brahms, as played by Mdlle Marie Krebs, the Standard of Monday calls the fair young Teuton, "the German Arabella Goddard."

Rubinstein's oratorio, The Tower of Babel, with a translation of the words into French by M. Victor Wilder, is shortly to be performed at the Théâtre-Italien under the direction of M. Dauré. After the Messiah comes the Deluge!

Mr Arthur Sullivan's oratorio, The Light of the World, is to be performed at Bradford on the 12th March, under the personal direction of the composer. The principal vocalists will be Mdme Lemmens, Mdme Patey, Mr Vernon Rigby, and Mr Santley.

The Daily Telegraph, in a letter from its indefatigable Paris correspondent, gives a picturesque and animated description of a bal masqué in the Venetian style, recently held at the mansion of M. Arsene Houssaye, late director of the Comédie Francaise.

Signor Giulio Perkins.—The death of Signor Perkins, the bass singer of Her Majesty's Opera Company, is announced as having taken place on Wednesday night, at the Queen's Hotel, Manchester. Signor Perkins had been ailing only about a week previous to his decease.

Madame Nilsson, whose health is completely re-established, has returned from Cannes to Paris, and will resume her artistic career with a tour in the south of France, followed by the promised representations in Brussels. Those of Paris are expected to come off later in the season.

Signor Schira has gone from Venice, via Milan, to Florence, to assist in the preparations for his long-expected opera, Selvaggio, which was received with such favour at the City of the Rialto that the composer was called on no less than twenty times in the course of the performance.

Mr Arthur Chappell continues to let the "Provincials" have a taste occasionally of his admirable "Monday Pops." There was a concert at Manchester last week, with Krebs, Joachim, Ries, Zerbini, and Piatti; and another was to take place on Wednesday in this week, with the same strong company.

A Scottish patron of art and music has engaged to bring from Milan, at his own expense, several Scottish and English vocalists, who are studying singing for the Italian Opera. They give a concert in Rome, for the benefit of the British Academy of Arts, the proceeds of the tickets already sold nearly realising one hundred pounds.

At Mr Henry Leslie's next concert, March 12th, at St James's Hall, a new Basso, Mr Riccardi, an English artist, who has studied in Italy, and has made a very favourable impression on the Italian and American stages, will make his début. According to foreign correspondents, Mr Riccardi bids fair to prove a valuable addition to the ranks of our native artists.

Two works of sculpture are being sent from Rome for exhibition in the Royal Academy, which will not fail to attract attention in the forthcoming exhibition. They are both by English artists—one a life-size marble statue of the Falconer, by Mr George Simonds; the other by Mr Charles Summers, a group representing Hypermnestra urging her husband, Lynceus, to flee.

Miss Rose Hersee comes back to London to play in English opera on Saturday next, the 27th, at the Philharmonic. In Maritana, a typical work of an English composer, the lady will sustain the title rôle, and London audiences will once more be able to enjoy a performance by one who has, since Parepa's death, been recognized as the leading English operatic artist.—Figaro.

Miss Amy Stewart, a young and promising pupil of Herr Sauerbrey—a correspondent informs us—made her début at the Crystal Palace last Monday. She played Mendelssohn's Capriccio in B minor, and Chopin's Impromptu in C sharp minor, with great precision, clearness of touch, and artistic expression, receiving much and well-deserved applause, and a recall after the second piece.

THE GAMUT (from "Punch").—Jack Bowbell (beginning his song): 'Appy land, 'appy land—" Tom Belgrave: "One moment. Excuse me, my dear fellow, but don't you think the song would go better if you were to sound your H's just a little?" Jack Bowbell: "Eh! sound my H's? (Chuckles.) 'Shows how much you know about music! No such note—only goes up to G. (Continues.) 'Appy land, 'appy land."

The intellectual department of the Herald is covering itself with glory in its reports of the Beecher trial. What could be more characteristic of the peculiar genius of that great newspaper than the following:—

"Mr Beecher had a playful smile on his substratum of sobriety, and Mrs Beecher, for the first time in the trial, laughed all over her face, once, twice and thrice. She has a very handsome, involuntary smile, with a set of regular teeth, perfectly white."

We have no idea as to what part of the human anatomy the "substratum of sobriety" belongs, and we don't know what "substratum of sobriety" means. But the alliteration is striking, and there must be something in it. As to the "very handsome, involuntary smile, with a set of regular teeth," we venture to say that has only been equalled by Mr Boffin's description of Mr Silas Wegg, as "a literary man with a wooden leg."—Arcadian.

We have our anniversaries here, but they are treading on our heels in the colonies. At Montreal, Canada, on the 3rd inst., was held a delightful Mendelssohn soirée, in memory of his birthday. The originator and carrier-out of the happy idea was Mr Joseph Gould, well known in that city as a first-rate organ player, and a lover and promoter of good music in any deserving shape. The programme was in two parts, six sacred and six secular numbers, all from the compositions of the master. It was a happy idea, and does credit to Mr Gould, Miss Vogt, Mr Turney, and all others who took part in it. Bravo, Montreal!

The newly-published Life of the Prince Consort gives in an Appendix a list of the printed compositions of the Prince. These include twenty-nine Songs and Romances collected in five volumes, nearly all being written to German words. A Te Deum, Jubilate, Sanctus, an Anthem, a Christmas Hymn and a Chorale ("Gotha") are also named. The same Appendix includes a list of the compositions selected by the Prince for performance at the Ancient Concerts during the years 1840 to 1848, and at the Philharmonic Society 1848-1860, which shows that his taste for the art was not only refined, but that his acquaintance with music was wide.

PROPOSED TESTIMONIAL TO DR SLOMAN.—As Dr Sloman is about leaving Scarborough, an influential party of his friends, comprising the members of the Scarborough Amateur Vocal and Instrumental Society, have organized a subscription to enable them to present to him a testimonial of the gratitude and esteem they entertain towards him, and of their appreciation of the assiduity, ability, and courtesy with which he has acted as the honorary conductor of the society for upwards of five years.—We understand Dr Sloman will leave Scarborough in the course of a few weeks, he having accepted the appointment of organist of St Giles' Church, Reading.

VOLTAIRE AND SHAKESPEARE'S WOMEN.—Voltaire, who at first could not prevent himself from admiring Shakespeare, soon regretted his admiration. Poets like Shakespeare are not lions to be tamed, ornamented with philosophic maxims, and made to jump through the hoops of tragédies de circonstance. The king of the desert roared in such a fashion when he found himself in the company of Sophonisbe and L'Orphelin de la Chine, that the tamer found it prudent to shut him up in his cage again, and send him back to the fogs of the three kingdoms with the epithet of barbarian. For a long time it was agreed that Voltaire was right. No one will accuse Voltaire of unfairness, or that the author of the Pucelle should not very well understand Juliet, Ophelia, and Desdemona.

We (Musical Standard) are informed that a new choral society is in course of formation at Brighton. The new society, which has already been promised the support of several of the nobility and gentry of the town and neighbourhood, will have for its principal object the giving of concerts somewhat similar to those given in London by Mr Henry Leslie's Choir, and the programme will consist of madrigals, and other part songs. At a meeting held on Friday week it was decided that the musical direction should be entrusted to Mr Worsley Staniforth, a gentleman well known in the town as organist of Trinity, and for some years at St Paul's. It was also decided that the society should be named and known as "Mr Staniforth's Choir." As to the desirability of the formation of a society such as this, we feel pretty certain that there will not be two opinions amongst those who are interested in musical matters in the town; and as there are, no doubt, many members of choirs, besides the great number of amateur singers not engaged in that capacity, and who are not connected with any similar society, we may confidently look forward to a successful series of choral concerts when the Brighton season comes round again.

Miss Rose Hersee was married on Tuesday last, to Mr Arthur Howell, the well-known violoncellist and conductor.

Signor Agnesi was a Belgian by birth, and the son of an organist, M. Agniez. His magnificent voice was noticed by Mr Gye, the impresario of our Royal Italian Opera, some years since, in Paris, and, in consequence, Agnesi was engaged at that establishment. These last few years Agnesi had been the leading bass at Drury Lane, and, at the same time, a favourite singer at oratorio and secular concerts. He was master of every style. He rendered Handel's "Honour and Arms," and "'Revenge!' Timotheus cries," with as much brilliancy as he knew how to impart dignity to arias like Beethoven's "Deign, great Apollo." In music like Mozart's "Non più andrai," Agnesi displayed spirit and humour, whilst, for the florid music of Assur (Semiramide), he possessed a flexibility of voice which any basso-robusto might envy.—Pictorial World.

FLORENCE.—The Musical Institute has conferred its diploma of honorary member on Sig. Delle Sedie for his work entitled L'Arte lirica.

PARMA.—Il Conte Verde, by Sig. Giuseppe Libani, has been successfully produced at the Teatro Reale. With the exception of the tenor, Sig. Ronconi, the artists were not good.

THE FORMATION AND CULTIVATION OF THE VOICE FOR SINGING

Price 12s.

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, REGENT STREET, W.

"The remarkable qualities of this book are the author's freedom from conventional trammels, the strong sense of his opinions, and the novelty yet evident soundness of his precepts; his work has consequently come into general use as a manual of vocal instruction."—Daily News.

DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE,

For invigorating and enriching the voice, and removing affections of the throat.

DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE is universally acknowledged to be the most valuable remedy for sore throat, hoarseness and relaxed throat. It should always be taken before singing or reciting, as it strengthens the vocal organs. It is most extensively prescribed by the faculty for the throat and voice. Dr Lewis of Basingstoke says he finds them most efficacious, and in Dr Copland's Dictionary of Practical Medicine (Longman & Co.), they are strongly recommended at pages 872 and 1492. They are used by all the greatest vocalists and orators in Europe, and have been established over a quarter of a century. Testimonials from Patti, Grisi, Lablache, Santley, &c. Sold in boxes, 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. by all Chemists throughout the Unintd Kingdom and the Colonies.

PROFESSORSHIP OF MUSIC.

TO THE MEMBERS OF THE SENATE OF THE UNIVERSITY OF CAMBRIDGE.

GENTLEMEN,—I beg leave to offer myself as a candidate for the office of Professor of Music in the University of Cambridge, vacant by the death of Sir Sterndale Bennett.

It is with some degree of diffidence I have entertained the hope of succeeding so distinguished a musician in a position of so much dignity. At the same time, I trust that my earnest and arduous labours during past years have not altogether been unnoticed by those who are interested in the art I have the honour to profess.—Faithfully yours,

J. BARNBY.

Composed by ALEXANDER REICHARDT.

SUNG BY MDLLE CARLOTTA PATTI.

A peine ai-je vu le printemps
Couvrir dix fois de leur feuillage
Les vieux saules de nos étangs,
Que, sans pitié pour mon jeune âge,
Dieu m'a ravi le guide aimé
Qui me prodiguait ses tendresses!
Je pleure son regard charmé!
Je ne reçois plus ses caresses!

Ainsi parlait, en gémissant,
Une orpheline désolée;
Mais un bel ange, l'embrassant,
Lui dit, d'une voix inspirée:
"Ne pleure plus et sois ma sœur
Ma mère sera notre mère,
Et tu verras que du bonheur
Il en est encor sur la terre!"

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

(From the "Daily Telegraph.")

On Monday evening Mr Chappell offered his patrons a feast of novelty, and as many accepted the invitation as were necessary for encouragement. English amateurs do not respond under such circumstances with all desirable readiness, for which reason entrepreneurs have small inducement to go out of the beaten track leading to profit if not to abundant honour. But an improvement is taking place, and the appearance of St James's Hall last Monday could hardly have given other than satisfaction. Mr Charles Hallé had the honour of introducing the first novelty—a group of pieces chosen from Bach's compositions for the clavier. Every amateur knows the corner of the great Bach garden where he may find that which in music is analogous to the primrose, violet, and forget-me-not—flowers rich with the grace, sweetness, and modesty of nature. Therefrom Mr Hallé culled his posy, chosing the Præambulum of the fifth Partita, the aria of the sixth, the Passepied from No. 5 of the Suites Anglaises and the Gigue from the corresponding number of the Suites Françaises. A better selection of its kind could not have been made, nor could the dainty music have had finer rendering. Mr Hallé's style was suited to perfection, especially by the Gigue, which fully displayed the neatness, accuracy, and facility of his mechanism. The audience insisted upon an encore of this movement, and were delighted with the performance as a whole. Schumann furnished the second novelty—his grand sonata in D minor for pianoforte and violin (Op. 121). The year 1851, in which this work was written, must be regarded as one of the busiest of the composer's life. During the twelve months, besides the sonata under notice, and a host of songs, he produced the cantata, Der Rose Pilgerfahrt; the pianoforte trio in G minor (dedicated to Gade); part of the Ball-scenen; three Fantasiestücke; the Marchen-Bilder, for pianoforte and viola; and the overtures to the Bride of Messina, Julius Cæsar, and Hermann and Dorothea. Nor are these all, for to the same year we owe another sonata for pianoforte and violin, in A minor (Op. 105), which, though of less importance than its only successor, deserves the attention now, in all probability, awaiting it. The sonata in D minor is a most characteristic example of its composer's genius, whether taken as a whole, or movement by movement. In the opening Allegro, for example, we have a striking instance of the tendency to scholasticism which afforded, during the composer's later years, a counterpoise to the freedom of an earlier time. As was pointed out with great acuteness by the programme annotator, the movement referred to is, with slight exception, constructed from the materials of a brief vorspiel. We may doubt—perhaps it should be said we must doubt—whether Schumann appears at his best under conditions of such severe restriction, even when it is evident that he is writing in a happy mood. But, all question of comparison put aside, the opening of the D minor sonata affords a study of what can be done by learning and fancy with scanty means. We say "study" advisedly, because the music does not, upon a first acquaintance excite due admiration; and because it needs that perfect familiarity with the composer's design, for want of which many productions of genius are hastily and unjustly condemned. No fear of a like result clouds the prospects of the Scherzo and slow movement. These, so to speak, "carry their hearts on their sleeve," and reveal their beauty and charm to a glance. The Scherzo, with its two diverse episodes, and quasi-choral ending, is Schumannesque to the last degree, and equally so is the slow movement which, adopting the theme of the quasi-choral, bases upon it a series of variations. Both are lovely examples of the master; instinct with his originality and tenderness, not less than with that subtle expression of melancholy never found apart from the works of a true poet. The Finale is another masterpiece, imagination and technical resource being equally displayed from first to last. Briefly, the hearing of this sonata was an event to be remembered, and marked a distinct advance in the movement which is lifting Schumann to a place among those whom English amateurs most reverently worship. The work was played by Herr Joachim and Mr Hallé in a manner open to very slight criticism. Mr Hallé might have thrown greater intensity of feeling into the Allegro and Finale, but his performance in the other movements defied reproach. Herr Joachim was simply perfection. The third novelty Mr Chappell found—where one would hardly look for such a thing—in the works of Beethoven, and consisted of an "Adagio, Variations, and Rondo," for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello, constructed upon a theme from Müller's opera, Die Schwestern von Prag. In his biography of the master, Schindler says, referring to the variations on Diabelli's valse:—"These were completed in June, 1823, and delivered to the publisher without the usual amount of time bestowed on giving them the finishing touches, and now he sets to work at once on the Ninth Symphony, some jottings of which were already written down. Forthwith all the gay humour that had made him more sociable, and in every respect more accessible, disappeared. All visits were declined." The Choral Symphony was first performed May 7, 1824, and on that day the Müller variations were published. In all probability, therefore, the two works progressed together towards completion; the lightness of the one serving to relieve the massiveness of the other, and affording that distraction of mind which Beethoven would not seek among his friends. The theme belongs to a song, "Ich bin der Schneider Kakadu," in the opera already named, and appears to have enjoyed considerable favour. We may even doubt whether it did not originally exist as a people's tune, inasmuch as it was introduced into a kind of musical play, Rochus Pumpernickel, and known in Vienna several years before Müller's opera obtained a hearing there. However this may be, the melody is one of primitive simplicity, and, judging by Beethoven's choice in other cases, was adapted to please him, as a subject for treatment. The master discourses largely upon his quaint text, first employing the fantasia form by way of introduction, then proceeding to the tune with nine variations, and finishing with a rondo, which may be said to comprise two variations more and a coda. All this is interesting in a high degree, and much of it characterized by great beauty. The variations, as such, will not compare with Beethoven's finest efforts in that line; but, taking the work as a whole, it is one we are glad to see placed in the Monday Popular repertory for, let us hope, occasional use.

The concert began with Beethoven's Lobkowitz quartet in B flat, and was made further enjoyable by the singing of Mdlle Johanna Levier, who, in lieder by Mendelssohn, Schubert, and Schumann, displayed the rare artistic power which amateurs recognized as soon as she came amongst us. Mdlle Levier, being what she is, could not sing in vain to such an audience, and the applause that followed every song—above all, the encore given to Schubert's "Wohin"—bespoke thorough gratification.

JOHN MORRIS HOGAN.

(From a Correspondent.)

It is with deep regret we announce the death of this talented artist, which took place at his residence in Bayswater, a few days ago. Mr John Morris Hogan studied with Kalkbrenner at the Conservatoire. While in Paris he was associated with the first artists of his day. He spent a great deal of his professional life in Ireland, and afterwards at Jersey. His playing was always characterized by great clearness and brilliancy of execution. Of late years he had retired from the musical profession; but there are many old pupils, as well as amateurs, who will deplore the death of one esteemed alike for his artistic gifts and his amiable qualities in private life.

MUSIC AT OXFORD UNIVERSITY.

The second examination for the degree of Mus. Bac. will commence on Tuesday, April 6, at 10 a.m., in the Music School. The examination for the degree of Mus. Doc. will commence at the same time and place as the above. Candidates whose exercises have been approved, and who propose to offer themselves for either of the above examinations, are to give in their names to Mr George Parker, the Clerk of the Schools, on or before April 3, to pay the statutable fee of £1, and to exhibit their "Testamur" of having passed the previous examination.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.

(From the "Daily Telegraph," Feb. 27.)

Last night the Sacred Harmonic Society did an act of which we, and all who desire that that great institution should fitly represent and worthily honour English music, are glad. As no chance of misrepresentation now exists, we may here speak of a matter which, ever since the concert immediatedly following Sterndale Bennett's death, has been common talk. When that opportunity was allowed to pass without the slightest sign of regret for the loss of a distinguished man, while everywhere else demonstrations of sorrow abounded, the natural question arose, "Why?" Then it was recollected how, some quarter of a century ago, feud sprang up between Michael Costa and Sterndale Bennett, and how the remembrance of that feud, which else would have been forgotten, was kept alive by the great conductor refusing to touch the works of his English confrère. Calling this to mind, an answer to the "why" became easy, and, in not a few quarters, was promptly given. Sir Michael Costa was censured for carrying a quarrel beyond the grave, and the society was pointed at as an accessory. We now know that the charge in each case had no foundation. Sir Michael Costa was not unwilling to render homage to the memory of our greatest composer—he did it, last night, by conducting the Dead March in Saul; neither was the society unmindful of its duty—for the solemnity just named took place on its initiative, and under its auspices. Pity 'tis that the act was not done earlier, and the possibility of reproach avoided. But better late than never. The society and its conductor have accomplished what was expected of them, and all is well. In the sense, however, that there exists "than lowest depth a deeper still," there is a better than the best. We can show the Sacred Harmonic Society how to improve upon the gracious ceremony of last night, and wipe from every memory all trace of the past. Let the directors give a performance of the one work, The Woman of Samaria, with which our dead composer enriched the repertory of oratorio. By doing so they would prove to the world their conviction that the man, whose memory was honoured last night, did something to deserve homage. Meanwhile, it is pleasant to recall the degree in which the performance of Handel's simple but sublime dirge accorded with public feeling. The audience rose with one consent and stood to the end.

Very fittingly the oratorio of last evening was the work of a composer who, unchallenged, and as though by right divine, has stepped into Sterndale Bennett's place. We refer, of course, to the St John the Baptist of G. A. Macfarren. Once before heard in Exeter Hall, this oratorio now holds, if appearances may be trusted, a firm grasp of popular favour. Its progress ever since October 23, 1873, when it was produced at Bristol, may be rightly described as imperial. Gates and walls have fallen down before it, and everywhere, on its account, the crooked has been made straight and the rough places plain. Such fortune for the work of an Englishman is phenomenal, and may seem too good to last. But Mr Macfarren's oratorio, though it went up like a rocket, is in no danger of coming down like the stick. Familiarity deepens the impression of its greatness. Its force and vigour, its noble elevation, its masterly use of every artistic resource, grow upon one, like the majesty of the Pyramids and the awfulness of Niagara. So have these qualities grown upon the Exeter Hall audience. Well received at its first hearing, the work excited enthusiasm last night. All rules against applause were ignored, and the semi-religious atmosphere of an oratorio performance in the Strand was stirred by noises as loud and emphatic as those which, at the Monday Popular Concerts, acclaim a Beethoven quartet. Three numbers—the chorus, "This is my beloved Son," the duet for Herod and John, and the unaccompanied quartet—were encored, while, at the close, Mr Macfarren was called for and cheered to the echo. We cannot heighten the significance of these facts. They mean that in St John the Baptist we have a great and lasting work. Some of us knew this long ago, it is true, but, after all, there is enough divinity in the vox populi to make us glad when it speaks on our side. The performance was by no means free from defects, both band and chorus being occasionally at fault. But the difficult music is yet unfamiliar, and it would be unfair not to make allowances on that account. The solos entrusted to Madame Sherrington, Madame Patey, Mr Lloyd, and Mr Santley suffered least, as will at once be assumed when it is remembered that these artists "created" their respective parts at the Bristol Festival. Madame Sherrington, by the way, introduced the original air of Salome instead of the one written to replace it, but whether it suits her better is an open question. Further details are unnecessary. Enough that the performance was accepted on all hands as a success, towards which, it should be added, Sir Michael Costa contributed his utmost.

THE LATE STERNDALE BENNETT.

Dr Ferdinand Hiller, in the Cologne Gazette, writes as follows about Sir William Sterndale Bennett:—

"From London we receive the mournful account of the death of an excellent musician, the glory of his country, recognized and highly esteemed everywhere. Bennett was born April 16th, 1816, and died quite unexpectedly on the 1st ult. He was the son of an organist in Sheffield, where he began his musical career as a little chorister in the church. Early an orphan, he received his education as an artist in the Royal Academy of Music, London, of which he afterwards became Principal. His talent as a pianist and composer showed itself very early. When, in the winter of 1838-1839, he came to Leipsig, he earned by his playing the most general admiration, and the works he had composed at that time, a concerto for the piano, the overture, The Naïades, and a number of smaller compositions for the piano, have the stamp of finished works of art, and are scarcely surpassed by later productions. His playing, perfect with regard to 'technique,' was of the most finished delicacy, and full of gracefulness and warmth. In his compositions, especially in his characteristic overtures, the great influence of Mendelssohn is not to be denied, but they are so finished in form, so charming in invention, and contain, on the other hand, so much that is individual, that his works are entirely free from the reproach which mostly falls on that mechanical imitation which has produced the great mass of songs, with and without words, motets, psalms, and the like. Mendelssohn esteemed him highly, and Schumann, enthusiastic about him, gave his portrait, accompanied by the most poetical words, to the readers of the Neue Zeitschrift for a new year's present. In his country Bennett received the highest honours. He became Professor of Music in the University of Cambridge, Doctor of Music, Master of Arts, D.C.L., and was raised to Knighthood by the Queen, and now he receives a resting-place among the greatest of his people in Westminster Abbey—a distinction, the like of which, perhaps, no other nation has to offer.

"As a man, Bennett was most honourable and amiable, simple, unpretending, frank, faithful, good-natured, cheerful, and hospitable. We German musicians were received by him always in the most cordial manner. For several years he had retired from public life, and having been active before, by giving concerts and directing—especially the Philharmonic Concerts—he only lived now for his pupils and his academy.

"We saw him for the last time at the Beethoven Festival at Bonn, when he appeared to be happy and enraptured. As a musician, he belonged with all his heart to Germany and its masters. England is proud of him, and, by all means, has every reason to be so."

PRAGUE.—In consequence of a severe domestic affliction, the third Conservatorium Concert was deprived of Madame Norman-Néruda's co-operation.* The altered programme is as follows:—Franz Schubert's Fantasia (C major), arranged for orchestra, by Joseph Joachim (new); Robert Volkmann's Concertstück, Op. 42, played by Herr Capellmeister; Max Bruch's Introduction to Lorely, W. Treiber; Ballade, by Reinecke, Andante, by Brahms, and Wagner's Spinnerlied, arranged by Liszt—Herr W. Treiber; "Scheherazade," Concert Overture, by Heinrich Urban (new). Herr Charles Oberthür, the celebrated harpist, from London, is engaged for the fourth concert. Herr Oberthür made a most favourable impression here some years ago, both as a composer and executant, when he had the exceptional honour to play before the Emperor Ferdinand, and to receive the diploma of honorary member of the "Society of Music in Bohemia," as well as of the Society "Daord." Herr Oberthür is announced to play Parish Alvars' Concerto in E flat, for harp and orchestra, and his own Fantasia, "Souvenir de Londres."

* Unfortunately, Madame Norman-Néruda was prevented from appearing at this concert, in consequence of the death of her father. Herr Treiber, pianist, from Gratz, was got as substitute for this concert.

STERNDALE BENNETT.

In the course of an admirable article on our late master, contributed to the Musical Times, Mr H. C. Lunn writes as follows:—

"In this institution (the Royal Academy of Music) I first met him. He was seated at a table in the professors' room when I entered, and, with that irresistible manner which attracted all towards him, made me in five minutes as much at my ease as if we had known each other for years. Then he began to speak to me about music, for I was to be his pupil (he being a master in the Institution, although still a student), and the exercise he then set me is now in my possession. But I was too much absorbed in what he was doing when I came in to think intently upon what I was doing myself. Music paper was before him, and he was writing a pianoforte concerto, the whole of which he played to us when the hour of instruction was over. Never shall I forget it; delicacy, beauty of tone, eloquence of phrasing, an indiscribable charm in his mere touch, so fascinated his listeners that it was with difficulty he managed to escape from the room. On me, having just entered the Institution, the effect was of course greater than upon those of his fellow-students who were acquainted with his wonderful gifts; and, as he had not then made a name outside the walls of the Academy, I was naturally astonished at the exhibition of such mature talent amongst the pupils of a music school. At this time there were evening orchestral rehearsals at the Academy, which were directed by Sterndale Bennett. Here the Students were trained to the contemplation of good music; and never would the young conductor, I well recollect, allow any pupil to remain in ignorance of the composition being performed. 'Listen,' he said to me, on the first evening of my entrance, 'this is a symphony by Beethoven; try to comprehend the symmetrical construction of the work, and carry away as much as you can with you to think upon afterwards.' If such solicitude for the artistic welfare of those around him existed in the boy, it may readily be believed how it ripened and expanded in the man. During these sunny days, music flowed from his pen as freely as from his fingers."

MUSIC AT BRUSSELS.

The weather here has been quite as detestable as in most other European capitals, and has, in consequence, played sad havoc with the plans and arrangements of M. Campocasso, the manager of the Théâtre Royal de la Monnaie. To such a pitch have things come that M. Campocasso has been obliged to change his bill three times in the course of the same day. However, it appears that there are six medical men attached to the theatre, so it is to be hoped that the disabled members of the company, having got rid of their colds, rheumatism, coughs, and bronchitis, will speedily be enabled to resume their professional duties, and go on with the rehearsals, temporarily suspended, of Le Nozze and La Reine de Chypre. There is some talk of reviving Hamlet for M. Devoyod, and Rigoletto for Madlle Hamaekers, who was much applauded last year in the character of Gilda. M. Sylva has been recalled to sing in Paris for some of his comrades, who have succumbed to the severity of the season; but he will return shortly, and appear in Halévy's opera of La Juive. M. Achard is announced to make his bow early in the present month. A young basso, M. Dauphin, has made his first appearance on any stage as Max, in Le Châlet. The result was encouraging; but the Théâtre Royal de la Monnaie should not throw its doors open to novices, however promising. A little practice in the provinces should always precede an artist's appearance in the capital, both for his own sake and for that of the public.

Les Prés Saint Gervais has not proved a success at the Alcazar.

The programme of the fifth Concert Populaire included Schumann's Symphony, only performed once under M. Vieuxtemps; the "Hungarian Dances" of Johannes Brahms; the second part of Berlioz's dramatic symphony, Roméo et Juliette; Beethoven's Overture to Coriolan; and Mendelssohn's Pianoforte Concerto, the executant of the last piece being Madlle Annetta Essipoff, who was much applauded. This young lady performed also Chopin's Nocturne in D, the Gavotte, arranged by Johannes Brahms, from Gluck's Iphegenia in Aulis, a Study by the Abbate Franz Liszt, and a short piece by M. Anton Rubinstein.

A very successful concert was recently given by Mrs Stanley, under the patronage of J. S. Lumley, Esq., English Minister, for the benefit of the poor. A number of well-known amateurs, Belgian and English, took part in the performance, which wound up by the presentation of a laurel wreath to Mrs Stanley, as a slight mark of the high esteem in which her generous efforts were held.

MDLLE KREBS' FIRST RECITAL.

(From the "Globe.")

Mdlle Marie Krebs gave the first of two recitals of pianoforte music on Wednesday, at St James's Hall. She played, alone, the Fantasia Chromatica and Fugue in D, of J. S. Bach, and a group of shorter pieces by Sterndale Bennett, Schubert, and Mendelssohn; and, in conjunction with Signor Piatti, Mendelssohn's Sonata in D (Op. 58), and Chopin's Introduction and Polonaise Brillante in C (Op. 3). Of Mdlle Krebs' intentions and capability of giving expression to them our readers will know we have never had but one opinion. It is pleasant to find that opinion shared by a steadily increasing circle of amateurs. Next to the production of a great singer, that of a great pianist is, having regard to the number of persons trained with a view to becoming the one or the other, one of the rarest of events. Given certain psychological and physiological qualifications—without which the best directed industry can only result in moderate success—admirable teaching at the right time, a power of continuous effort unimpatient of early results, and the sunshine of intelligent praise, not before it had ceased to be dangerous—these are only some of the conditions needed to make a great musical artist. Mdlle Krebs was, we believe, what is commonly called "a juvenile prodigy." Happily for her, promise was not mistaken for performance, or indication for completeness. On the contrary—we judge only by her power as evidenced in public performance—years of study and practice have been spent in ripening the clever child into the thorough artist. The charm of Mdlle Krebs' playing can hardly fail to act on those who are brought for ever so short a time under its influence. But it can only tell in its fulness on those who are familiar with it. The varieties of timbre, or even of intensity, of which the pianoforte is capable are limited—far more so, for instance, than those available to even an average performer on the violin. Yet under the hands of Mdlle Krebs the former even are considerable, and the latter infinite. A touch by the agency of which any succession of sounds can be produced with perfect equality of force, refined by a consummate apprehension of the value of emphasis, can give to unarticulated sounds the charm and almost the meaning of articulated. To say that every kind of musical passage is rendered by Mdlle Krebs with unerring certainty is to say what might be said of many of her contemporaries. To say that she maintains the most perfect proportion in the rendering of every kind of passage—proportion whether of combination or succession—is to say what would be true of but few of her contemporaries. Perhaps the most striking characteristic of her execution is that, whether she gives to each note of a passage the utmost tone of which without harshness it might seem capable, or touches the finger-board with a delicacy which might seem rather that of the breath than of the hand, its rhythm is never for a moment equivocal; or, to speak precisely and technically, there can never be a moment's doubt as to what part of a measure she is dealing with. None know the full value of this power like those who have to play in concert with those who possess it, but, consciously or unconsciously, it must be felt by all who come under its influence. Details as to Mdlle Krebs' execution of the several pieces we have named are needless. Like all great artists, she has, doubtless, her preferences, and plays one piece with more pleasure than another. But a lively "conscience du metier" obliges her to play everything as well as she can, that is to say, better than almost anybody else could play it.

Mdlle Krebs' second recital is on Wednesday, the 10th inst.

BERLIN.—The only novelty at the Royal Operahouse has been the frequent and sudden change of performance. Here, as elsewhere, singers are human, and their throats are no more proof than those of their colleagues in other lands against the dangerous rawness and cold of the atmosphere.—M. Anton Rubinstein has given a well-attended concert, at which he introduced some original compositions of his own. They met with general approbation.—At the last Monday Concert of Herren Hellmich and Engelhardt, a prominent feature in the programme was Beethoven's Octet in E flat major, for two oboes, two clarinets, two bassoons, and two horns, the performers being Herren Wieprecht, Baack, Pohl, Dittmann, Richter, Lehmann, Malchow, and Vehse. The work is very seldom heard in this, its original, form; it is generally known as arranged for a stringed quintet. It was exceedingly well played.

MÉHUL AND THE MUSIC OF THE FUTURE.*

People are too ignorant of the profound influence exerted by Gluck in developing the author of Joseph and of Uthal, of Stratonice, of Une Folie, and of Irato. "It was he, it was this great man," exclaims Méhul, "who initiated me into the philosophical and poetic portion of musical art." The good folk who imagine that the whole idea of modern opera dates no further back than from Richard Wagner have only to study the works of the composer of Givet; they will find therein abundance of useful information. The fact is, never did any one deserve less than he did the reproach justly addressed, in our days, to specialists, of sacrificing to musical pomp the highest conditions of the drama—the progress of the action and the truth of the characters. To fall into the trap set by Herr Wagner for the ingenuous and unoccupied, one should not be acquainted with a single note by Méhul; for I defy the world to mention, even among the most noisy disciples of the Wagnerian school, any composer more imperturbably attached than Méhul to the practice of the system.

Have you ever heard of a one-act comic opera entitled, Uthal? I doubt it very much; and yet, though a person would scarcely believe it, this simple comic opera, in one act only, into the bargain, was big with all the theories which we have since seen breaking over us with such a hubbub. Uthal! It strikes you at once as having something of a sham-epopœia about it. You fancy you recognize in the title the heroic precursor of Tannhäuser and Lohengrin. The action takes place in the good old times of Ossian; and Méhul, considering that it was not sufficient for his music that he should merely apply himself to the study of character, believing, like Cæsar, that nothing is done while anything remains to be done, resolved to give the world something in the way of historical, or, still better, local colouring. To produce a monotonous music, tinged with crepuscular melancholy, a sort of grisaille, similar in its effect to the dull ocean vapours which envelop in fog the Caledonian coast, such was his set purpose in this work, imitated from Ossian, as we read on the title page of the engraved score, the system being so deliberately carried out that we see him, though it is almost impossible to imagine such a thing now-a-days, push the scruples of temperance to the length of refraining from the use of violins, which he excludes from his orchestra as too Venetian in their colouring for such a subject. "In the execution of this work the violins must be replaced by tenors." He takes care to explain his theory by way of preface. The flutes, oboes, clarinets, bassoons, and four horns, with the tenors (quintes), constitute the orchestra, which is inexorably confined to one grey key. We must not forget, however, a stroke on the gong, struck at the right moment, and even less must we forget the harps, which cannot fail to be present, seeing that in an opera imitated from Ossian there are always bards. I think that no one ever sacrificed with greater conviction and austerity to the vain idol called dramatic truth. But the work failed; neither connoisseurs nor public would have aught to do with it. Every one acknowledged readily enough that, viewed in the light of fidelity of expression, it was sublime, but no one returned to hear it a second time; so true it is that there are certain things which are not better when sung than when spoken. It was at the first performance of Uthal that Grétry made his famous joke about a "louis d'or pour une chanterelle." But do not let us go too far; let us take care not to confound this error of an obstinate logician with the frequently admirable and healthy sobriety of Méhul's style. If the score of Uthal was the extravagance of a system, Une Folie and Joseph were its honour and its triumph. I purposely mention these two works, because, in the one as in the other, the composer, with the virtue of musical temperance distinguishing his nature, strikes me as having fixed the style, and displayed to his contemporaries under its double form, combining charm and grandeur, the true model of the comic opera of the future. After Joseph—Zampa, L'Etoile du Nord, and Le Pardon de Ploërmel may arise without any risk of destroying tradition, just as with Une Folie the way is paved for all the gallant repertory of Boieldieu, Auber, and their satellites. On opening Weber's correspondence, I find a passage applying too directly to the manners of the present day for us not to meditate upon it. "A score like that of Joseph," writes the author of Der Freischütz, and Euryanthe, "is now no longer possible, because there no longer exists a musician capable, without the aid of a pompous and dazzling orchestra, but solely by intensity of sentiment, warmth, and the truth of his ideas, of producing on the public a profound and durable effect. Who could remain insensible to such accents, all impregnated, I will not say by the breath of antiquity, but by the purest spirit of the Bible? There is no tinsel, no parasitism, no phrase to tickle more or less agreeably the ear; we have simply the naked truth, and—distinctive sign of an experienced hand—an instrumentation always sober, always moderate, in which the composer, while limiting his resources, succeeds in attaining the grandest effects." In Une Folie, Méhul has to do only with personages of the moment—Parisian types. To find the style and expression of his music, all he needs do, so to speak, is to look around him. With Joseph it is another thing, for the characters, manners, and countries to be depicted, his own observation cannot, of course, furnish him a single stroke; his fancy has to evoke the Unknown, to conjure up scenes of an anterior world, and to interpret passions which he has not himself experienced. The portrait painter has to become a Eustache Lesueur, for the score of Joseph is a musical fresco, the genuine fresco of a French master, rather grey in tone and deficient in brilliancy, but for sentiment and pathos, for purity of design and composition, able to defy anything.

When I reflect on the conditions of a work like this, and hear the noise made about the theories of Richard Wagner, I fancy I must be dreaming. What is there new, I should like to know, in them? What organic law of modern opera do all these pretended prophets of the Future advance which has not been carried out by this musician of the Past? Listen to that orchestra always purposely moderate, where modulation is introduced only at the call of dramatic truth; listen to that accompaniment always in keeping with the nature of the subject, and then ask yourself whether it is true, as we are informed, that such simultaneity of expression is a discovery of our own time. From the instrumentation let us proceed to the pourtrayal of the characters; another invention for which some individuals are pleased to claim the credit. Do we find that Joseph, Simeon, Benjamin, and Jacob are figures wanting plasticity, impersonal and abstract figures, heroes of classical tragedy such as were imagined at the same epoch by Marie Joseph Chénier? Let these figures sing, and, like the philosopher who, to prove the existence of movement, walked, they will forthwith convince you of their musical individuality. The reminiscences and the melancholy of Joseph, the remorse and repentance of Simeon, the candour of Benjamin, the sorrow of the old man, Jacob, his rage and his joy, are so many admirable motives treated with the inspiration and the talent of a master never found deficient in any of the principles really appertaining to his art. "To specify all the merits of this magnificent musical poem," continues Weber, "it would be necessary to write volumes." True, but what would be the good? Though it gains ground every day, barbarism has not pushed its invasion so far as to have driven from among us every notion of the True and the Beautiful, and though the masterpiece has disappeared from the stage, it is not, thank heaven, reduced only to the life derived exclusively from commentaries. Whatever trouble certain individuals of mediocre mind may give themselves to confuse different questions and to corrupt taste, truth still preserves its influence on a large number of artists, and on a large portion of the public. "However," exclaims Weber, in conclusion, "the beauty of works of this order is not a thing to be proved; all that is requisite is to appeal to the sentiments of those who hear them!" But the difficulty now-a-days is to hear them. Fortunately, if the stage is closed against them, they have still the Conservatory left, and we see them, at long intervals, pass from the library to the concert-room, like those sovereigns who, without quitting their palaces, on certain solemn days, harangue the multitude.

MUSIC IN MANCHESTER.

(From our Correspondent.)

A fine performance of the Creation was given at Mr Hallé's concert last Thursday. Mdme Lemmens-Sherrington, undaunted by a cruel bronchial attack, sung all the music for the powerful soprano, but, though her voice was to some extent affected, her consummate skill as a singer had seldom been more admired. Mr Nelson Varley, the tenor of the evening, was not quite so satisfactory, but Mr Whitney sang with remarkable taste, and his fine voice is heard to great advantage in the picturesque solos of this popular oratorio. The last miscellaneous concert of Mr Hallé's present series will be given to-morrow night. The programme is very attractive:—

Overture, Euryanthe (Weber); Scena and Aria, "O, 'tis a glorious sight to see" (Oberon) (Weber)—Mr E. Lloyd; Grand Concerto in G (Beethoven)—pianoforte, Mr Charles Hallé; Air, "Infelice" (Mendelssohn)—Mdlle Sophie Löwe; Symphony, No. 7, in C major (Haydn); Overture, "Waldmeisters Brautfährt" (first time) (Gernsheim); Air, "Love in her eyes sits playing" (Acis and Galatea) (Handel)—Mr E. Lloyd; Solo Pianoforte, "Præambulum, Aria, Passepied, and Gigue," in G (second time) (Bach)—Mr Charles Halle; Songs, "Die Nonne" (Schubert) and "Sonntag" (Brahms)—Mdlle Sophie Löwe; Overture, Tannhäuser (Wagner).

Will you allow me to correct two mistakes reported in the "Waifs" of last Saturday? The Odysseus of Max Bruch, to be given, as I told you last week, by the Manchester St Cecilia Society, assisted by Mr Santley, on the 13th inst., will not be conducted by Mr Hallé, but by Mr Ed. Hecht, the zealous conductor of the society. Nor have we been fortunate enough to hear "Krebs, Joachim, Ries, Zerbini, and Piatti," as you were informed. But a concert of classical chamber music will be given at the Concert Hall next week, at which MM. Hallé, Joachim, and Piatti will play, and this concert will, unfortunately, clash with Mr Unyer's chamber concert.

LIVERPOOL PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

(To the Editor of the "Liverpool Courier.")

SIR,—The scenes enacted at the adjourned meeting of the proprietors of the above society held yesterday, a report of which appears in your impression of to-day, will certainly not redound to their credit. Once again we find conductor, band, and chorus attacked by those who appear to know little of either, and whose chief idea as to the nature of the society's concerts is purely to make them a "social gathering." Whether the expression quoted was made or received jocularly or not, it should not be forgotten, for the conduct of the stalls and boxes during the subscription concerts would lead the most ordinary observer to the conclusion that music was the last thing considered.

Now, sir, a few words on behalf of the band and its conductor, Sir Julius Benedict. Mr Hallé's band and the Philharmonic band have been weighed in the balance, and the latter has been found wanting. If the Philharmonic Society are honoured by this gentleman's conducting, we are to expect a vast improvement, are we? I unhesitatingly, and with every respect for certain gentlemen, say decidedly, no. When Mr Hallé announces an orchestral concert, it is not difficult for him to secure the attendance of his band for rehearsals, the majority of the instrumentalists being on the spot, and consequently having the immeasurable advantage of frequent rehearsals. It is therefore no great accomplishment to have attained such a good name. Now the Philharmonic band is very differently constituted. Its members are scattered. One-half of them at least are members of Mr Hallé's band, while the rest hail from London, Yorkshire, and a few only are residents of this town, they being undoubtedly the very pick of the band. The Philharmonic band meet for rehearsal on the Monday evening preceding the concert, and on the afternoon of the day following, but on no occasion have they more than these two rehearsals. How is it, then, to be expected that this band can do itself justice? Is it honest to blame the conductor for this? I should say, on the contrary, more credit to him and the band for doing their work so well. If there ever was a case of adding insult to injury it was in suggesting the importation of Mr Charles Hallé to usurp the position of one of our most talented and esteemed contemporary musicians, Sir Julius Benedict.

Another fact in the Philharmonic band, which, though it may be unpleasant to state, is nevertheless a fact, is the want of unanimity among its members. The Manchester gentlemen unfortunately have not that good feeling towards their brother members that they should possess. They are much inclined to ride the high horse, and in many cases they work in an indifferent manner.

A few words as to the chorus. A quibble was made yesterday as to the representation of the practical members of the chorus on the committee of the society. The proprietors and the public generally should remember that the gentlemen of the chorus are admitted on the orchestra—first, by examination in music and singing; secondly, by payment of an entrance fee of half-a-guinea; and thirdly, by an annual subscription for two seats in the gallery of the hall. The ladies of the chorus are not considered members of the society, as they pay no entrance fee or subscription, but receive remuneration and a ticket for each concert. Considering, then, that the gentlemen of the chorus give not only their time but their money to further the interests of the society, it certainly was an ungracious act of the drones of the Philharmonic hive to raise the question as to whether the busy bees should have a voice or not in the storing and distribution of the musical honey.—Yours faithfully, ONE OF THE BEES.

ROYAL ALBERT HALL.

The Welsh concert, which took place on Monday evening last, was to all appearance a success, for the cheaper parts of the hall were not only well-filled, but the amphitheatre and the loggia boxes were also gaily tenanted. In this sort of national programme the unsophisticated public take a very natural delight, and there is a considerable class of the community who feel a special interest in the minstrelsy of Wales, in which they find a varied aggregate of tuneful ballads and warlike pæans, which tell their own story, and appeal at once to the commonest understanding. The selection on the present occasion contained, of course, all the music that could not well be absent from a representative Welsh programme, such as "The Ash Grove," "Jenny Jones," the "Men of Harlech," "Ar hyd y nos," and "God bless the Prince of Wales," and they met with the usual enthusiastic reception, Mdme Patey charming all ears—Welsh and English alike—by her clear and expressive delivery of the first two songs, and winning the usual encore for each. Miss Edith Wynne is also an indispensable artist at a Welsh concert, and to her the listeners were indebted for two pleasant contributions—namely, "Adieu to dear Cambria" and Morse's song from the Prince of Wales's Cantata, by John Owen, in both of which repetitions were asked for. The other lady vocalists were Miss Marion Williams, Miss Mary Davies, and Miss Lizzie Evans, and the songs they sang were good examples of the gentle and unambitious ditties of the Principality, and of the effect they are capable of producing when sung with simplicity and taste. Mr Edward Lloyd was likewise a prominent attraction in the business of the evening, and he too had his encore in a sentimental song adapted from "Y ferch o'r Seer," and by-and-bye applause, that did not, however, quite reach the encore point, in "Mentra Gwen." With this gentleman was associated Mr Lewis Thomas, whose versions of "The Quarrelsome Couple" and "St David's Day" were demanded a second time, no dismay being felt at the multitude of verses incident to each. The chorus singers were by no means idle, and the several pieces they sang, and which we need not specify, were in most cases received with tumultuous pleasure; and, as they were backed by a band of harpists, headed by Mr John Thomas and Mr Wright, their efforts were assuredly not the least important events of the evening. The two leading harpists also appeared as soloists. Fantasias on the piano were played by Miss Bessie Waugh and Mr Brinley Richards—Benedict's piece, "Cambria," being the lady's choice, and Mr Brinley Richards', his own "Recollections of Wales." Both were features of interest, Mr Brinley Richards' performance especially, partly on the ground of its finished excellence, and partly from the sentiment of respect due to this well-known professor for his zealous persistence in vindicating the national music of his country, and its claims upon the public attention. Mr Randegger accompanied the song sung by Miss Mary Davis, and Mr W. H. Thomas the others—both admirably. Altogether, the concert, we repeat, may be recorded as a success, and another Welsh selection may consequently be expected.

ROUEN.—M. Ambroise Thomas has consented to write a Grand Cantata for Chorus and Orchestra, to be sung at the foot of Boieldieu's statue during the centenary festival which will be celebrated in honour of that composer on Sunday, the 13th June. The French Government will award 25,000 francs on the same occasion to the best vocal association, the competition to be open to all such associations in France.

The Musical World,

LONDON, SATURDAY, MARCH 6, 1875.

THE eternal war between critics and their "subjects" has just had a curious exemplification. As a rule it is better not to notice when a galled jade winces. Very often the cause lies in an extremely sensitive nature, which makes its owner more an object of pity than of wrath. Not seldom, too, the thing complained about is due to inexpertness on the part of the writer rather than to malice aforethought. In all such cases the less said by those who stand round and look on the better. To use a homely phrase, "the more the matter is stirred, the more it stinks," whereas, if let alone, the offensive stuff will quietly sink to the bottom, out of sight and mind. But the affair in point is one from which lessons may be learned, quite valuable enough to make it an exception. Hence the notice we give it here.

In its review of music for the year 1874, the Monthly Musical Record of January said, "Of the British Orchestral Society it is impossible to speak favourably. Though the programmes were full of interest, and contained many novelties, the conductor, to tell the plain truth, is quite unfitted for his post; and, until some change is made in this direction, it is hopeless to expect good performances," &c. Looking at this paragraph apart from all the circumstances to which it gave rise, we see a very plain and unmistakable declaration of what the writer conceives to be a fact. So far, whatever the conductor of the British Orchestral Society may think, he—the writer aforesaid—did no more than he was paid to do. His engagement with the proprietors of the Monthly Musical Record necessarily bound him to pen what, under the guidance of his judgment, he conceived to be facts. He had a perfect right to believe that the conductor was "quite unfitted for his post," and a right not less perfect to convey that belief to the world. But there are two ways of doing a thing. A foolish and ignorant popular sentiment applauds the man who calls a spade a spade, while it looks coldly upon one who describes it euphemistically as an agricultural implement. Our own belief is that the latter shows himself much more a man of the world and of wisdom than the former. Euphemy is an important ingredient in the oil which makes society's machinery work smoothly; and none ought to be better aware of the fact than those who wield the power of the press. Holding such views, we must look upon the paragraph above quoted as unnecessarily coarse. The writer could have conveyed the same sense in much less offensive terms; and, because he did this not, he is open to the blame deserved by a clumsy worker. So much for the offending paragraph; and now let us go with the matter a step further.

In the number of the Monthly Musical Record for February, and in the most conspicuous part of it, readers saw a "leaded" paragraph, the gist of which was that the editor withdrew his remarks about the conductor of the British Orchestral Society as a statement of fact, but retained it as an expression of opinion. Evidently, though this was not said in distinct terms, some complaint had been made, and in such fashion did the editor desire to conclude a peace with the offended chef d'orchestre. We admit our inability to appreciate the distinction drawn by the Monthly Musical Record. Usually, when a man puts forward an opinion he desires to have it accepted as, from his point of view, a fact. If, for instance, we say of our contemporary's reviewer that he is inexpert, we commit ourselves to a statement of positive belief, otherwise we are false witnesses and without excuse. No doubt a distinction can be raised between matters of absolute fact, and those lying within the domain of opinion. It is certain that the whole is greater than a part, and that things which are equal to the same thing are equal to one another. These are absolute facts, but we wholly decline to suppose that our contemporary wished to withdraw his assertion from the category to which they belong. To do otherwise would be to suppose him capable of a very unworthy quibble. It stands, therefore, that, desiring to make an apology, he did so with the clumsiness characteristic of the offence. Either he should have unreservedly withdrawn the terms to which objection was raised, or manfully held by them. A middle course could only be disastrous, as the result proved.

Having yielded so far, it was to be expected that the Monthly Musical Record would find the last shred of the leek presented to its mouth. So, in the number for the current month appears a paragraph so extraordinary that we transcribe it word for word:—

"Since the last number of The Monthly Musical Record was issued, the Publishers have made inquiries concerning the professional qualifications of the conductor of the British Orchestral Society, and the result thereof is that they retract the comments on the conductor of the orchestra of which complaint was made. In so doing, the Publishers desire to state that they freely and unreservedly take upon themselves to withdraw the objectionable comments, and that they tender to the conductor in question their apologies for the same."

It is clear from this that the conductor of the British Orchestral Society pressed his advantage, the result being a complete withdrawal of the offending words, whether regarded as embodying a fact or an opinion. From one point of view, perhaps, the conductor is not blameworthy, because the temptation to crush a frightened opponent is hard to resist. But what shall we say of the "Publishers" of the Monthly Musical Record? They have tamely deserted their editor, and, hanging out a flag of truce, have bent the knee before an opponent whose position they might safely have defied. For this there is no valid excuse. As regards the editor, however much he may have blundered, for him we must entertain sympathy. His obvious duty is to cease that connexion with our contemporary which henceforth to him can be no source of honour. And now, one word as to the general bearing of the case. Musical criticism had better be given up altogether if it may not be stated, both as a matter of opinion and of fact, that a man is unfitted for his post. It is necessary often to say as much in the interest of art, as of politics, and that will be a sad day when the right is abandoned; because then the path of incompetence will be made straight towards those prizes which should be enjoyed by merit alone.

SIGNOR GIULIO PERKINS.

The funeral of this lamented gentleman took place on Monday last, at Highgate Cemetery. The mourners were—besides Mdme Perkins (Marie Rose)—Mr Carl Rosa, Mr Bentham, and Mr Josiah Pittman. Among others who attended to pay a last mark of respect, we observed Signor Urio, Signor Campobello, and Mr Aynsley Cook.

Royal Albert Hall Choral Society.—The next concert of this society will take place on Tuesday, the 9th inst., when Mendelssohn's Hymn of Praise, and Rossini's Stabat Mater will be performed. The principal vocalists announced are Madame Lemmens-Sherrington, Miss Annie Sinclair, Madame Patey, Mr Cummings, and Mr Whitney. Dr Stainer will preside at the organ, and the concert will be conducted, as usual, by Mr Barnby.

Mr William Coenen gave his first concert of modern German music at St George's Hall on Thursday night with great and deserved success. The programme was interesting throughout, and included, among other pieces, an admirable pianoforte quartet by a native composer, Mr A. C. Mackenzie. Mr Coenen's associates were MM. Wiener, Amor, Zerbini, and Lassere. The vocal music was entrusted to Miss Sophie Ferrari and Miss Antoinette Sterling. Further particulars in our next.

DEAN STANLEY ON MUSIC AND GEOLOGY.

It is not often that Westminster Abbey is so crowded as it was on Sunday afternoon, in spite of the bleakness of the weather, when Dean Stanley preached a funeral sermon in memory of the late Sir Charles Lyell and Sir Sterndale Bennett. The aisles were completely blocked with people who stood throughout the service, and many distinguished members of the scientific, musical, and religious world were present. The Dean selected for his text the 2nd verse of the 1st chapter of Genesis, "The earth was without form and void." He said it so chanced that within that short month of February, by a most unusual coincidence in mortality, twice the gates of that Abbey had been opened to pay the last honours to two distinguished Englishmen—one, the acknowledged chief of the English musicians of our time; the other, who was yesterday laid in his grave, the acknowledged chief of those who had devoted themselves to the study of our mother earth. Of all the branches of art or letters none revealed more fully the hidden capacities of the human soul, or the wonderful structure of the human frame, than the slow yet certain process by which, from the simplest and most barbarous sound, music—that art which heathens as well as Christians in all ages had not scrupled to call Divine—had brought into being worlds of melody, growing, in thought and volume, generation after generation, as time rolled on. The spirit which brooded over the lyre of Orpheus, or the primitive harp of David, was the same that afterwards gave breath and life to the Cathedral anthems and sacred oratorios of the most inspired masters. As an eminent living writer had said, seven notes in the musical scale—call them thirteen if they would—was indeed a poor outfit for so vast an enterprise as the genius of the masters of that glorious art had succeeded in completing. And to illustrate its marvels was the mission of the gentle musician who, three weeks ago, was laid to his rest within the walls of this venerable abbey; and again and again would his memory be recalled to them as they heard the sacred melody on which he had written, as on waves of light, those divine words which ought to stand as the principal of all Christian worship—"God is a spirit, and they that worship Him must worship Him in spirit and in truth." Having dwelt thus feelingly and at some length on the memory of the departed musician, the Dean said he proposed for a brief space to call the attention of his hearers to the religious aspect of the science of geology which a great modern historian had called "the peculiar boast of our age." A more eloquent, logical, truly devotional and persuasive sermon has never in our memory been delivered from the pulpit—even by Dean Stanley.

Lohengrin will almost certainly be produced at Covent Garden this season. Rehearsals of one kind or another are taking place every day.

Rome.—The ill-luck which has relentlessly pursued the management of the Teatro Apollo ever since the beginning of the season appears at length to have exhausted itself, at least temporarily, although it was only at the last moment that Signora Stolz was sufficiently recovered from severe indisposition to be able to sing. Aida has been produced with complete success. The theatre was crowded, though the prices of admission were anything but insignificant. Thirty lire, more than a pound sterling a goodish deal, were charged for an orchestra stall, and ten lire for a place in the pit. The principal characters of the opera were confided to Signore Stolz, Pozzoni (the latter in the place of Signora Sanz, on the sick list), Signori Niccolini, Aldighieri, and Nannetti. The applause began at the romance of the tenor, and was renewed at the War Song and the air of the soprano. In the second act the duet between Aida and Amneris was greatly applauded, the two artists being recalled twice. After the concerted piece, there were three recalls for the singers and the conductor, Sig. Usiglio. In the third act, the audience were even more prodigal of marks of approbation, and, at the fall of the curtain, the artists were called on some seven times. The enthusiasm was quite as great during the fourth act; one recall after the duet between Amneris and Radames; three recalls for Signora Pozzoni after the judgment scene; and three recalls for Signora Stolz and Sig. Niccolini, after the final duet. The band and chorus did their duty admirably; the scenery is very good, and so are the dresses. In a word, Aida is a hit.

The Allmanguha.

From ("Another World.")

"Improve Nature's gifts, and with her elements form new compounds . . . .
"Were man's faculties given that they should slumber?"

I saw, however, that unless the people were supplied with a substitute for what they had lost, they would soon return to the deleterious condiments in spite of my decree.

Having made known to all about me that I wished some hours for serious thought, I shut myself up in a little cabinet at the summit of my palace, where I could see only the heavens. All around me was silent and calm as night.

Having prayed the aid of the Great Power, I endeavoured, by intense meditation, to discover what healthy condiment could be substituted for the deleterious spices of which the people were deprived.

After many hours of deep meditation, a ray of light burst on me and I was inspired with a happy thought. I could not as yet see the result clearly, but nevertheless I felt that in the end my efforts would be blessed with success. I did not hesitate to publish the fact that I had made a discovery which when perfected, would repay the people twenty-fold for the loss of the condiments they had given up in obedience to my decree.

In the mean time, until I could fully carry out my intention, I allowed the people a particular kind of cordial; for I found that, after the extraordinary heat of the day, many persons required stimulants, especially mothers, who had been educated before my laws had come into operation, and whose health and constitution had not consequently been properly fortified.

I proceeded with my work. We have a small vegetable, called Jappehanka, that hangs from its stem like a fruit and has a rich creamy taste, without any other flavour. I grafted this vegetable on a tree called Klook, the fruit of which, used generally by persons of delicate digestion, had a sour aromatic flavour.

After many disappointments and unsuccessful attempts to obtain the vegetable I wished, I succeeded, by artificial means frequently employed, in growing a small vegetable, combining the flavour of a delicate cream with the piquancy of lemon.

The most difficult part of my task had however not been accomplished, namely, to give to the vegetable all the aromatic and stimulating flavours of the prohibited spices.

A fine specimen of the seed of each of the spice plants having been procured, I took from the heart of each seed the smallest possible particle, and, having with the greatest care made an incision in one of the finest seeds of my new vegetable, I inserted therein one specimen of each of these minute particles.

The incision was made in the centre of the seed, but not deep enough to enter or injure its heart.

The seed of my cream-lemon vegetable, containing the spice seed particles, I confided to the care of my principal gardener, a man of great scientific skill and intelligence.

I must not omit to say that we extracted the oil out of the roots of each of the spices formerly in general use and mixed the oils with the earth in which we planted the newly-compounded vegetable seed.

We watched the precious seed night and day with anxious solicitude. I had other seeds ready prepared and planted, in case this should fail.

OCCASIONAL NOTES.

According to the Entr'acte, on the proposal of General de Cissey, Minister of War, the President of the French Republic has taken steps to induce artists of talent to enrol themselves in the military bands, and to cause those already members of such bodies to remain so. Not only will the administrative councils of military corps be able to award monthly prizes or premiums to the musicians, according to their merit and the services they render, but a sum of 7000 francs will be allowed each regiment for the encouragement of musical studies.

The following anecdote is told respecting the first performance of Robert le Diable, which took place in Paris, the 21st November, 1831. It appears that the illustrious master with the modesty never possessed by men without talent felt little confidence in the success of his opera. He called and consulted Mad. Lénormant, celebrated for predicting the future by means of cards. She foretold three chutes (falls or failures). Exceedingly anxious, the great man took every possible means to avert the danger, and distributed tickets among all the friends he had in Paris. The success of Robert was immense, and yet Mad. Lénormant's prophecy was verified. Mad. Dorus had a fall in the third act, and Mad. Taglioni had one in the ballet of the Nuns, while Nourrit, in the last act, fell down the trap by which Bertram had disappeared.

The St Louis Journal furnishes a pen and ink sketch of Mdlle Albani which the many friends of that lady will read with interest:—

"Socially Mdlle Albani is as attractive as the most rigid observer of propriety could desire. She is modest and unassuming in her manner, totally free from any little stage licences, so common with even great prime donne, and in her conversation with friends and acquaintances, maintains the dignified bearing with the courteousness that speaks the perfect lady. Her accent is of just that slightly foreign tinge that renders her conversation attractive. She talks freely and well, is evidently devoted to her profession and expresses a strong desire to attain even greater excellence. She is apparently perfectly free from all petty jealousies, praises her rivals for the merits which strike her as most conspicuous, and is laudably reticent on the subject of her own triumphs. At first meeting the casual observer would not be very much impressed with her appearance. She is certainly not beautiful, although her features are not unattractive. Her great charm lies in her smile, and little French ways that would soon break down any barrier of prejudice. She dresses plainly but elegantly, commonly avoiding all vulgar display of jewelry. She shakes hands in true American style, and the visitor goes away impressed with the feeling that her English good-bye is an au revoir. Those that have met Albani since her visit to our city will wish much happiness to the little lady in her travels, and will be among the first to welcome her back again."

A Physician has published at St Petersburgh some curious observations regarding the atmosphere of the grand Maria Theatre in that capital, during a performance. The observations were made in a front box of the second tier. The temperature rose with every quarter of an hour, though the public, by leaving their seats and opening the doors between the acts, allowed the external air to penetrate inside the building. At the rising of the curtain the temperature was 18 degrees, centigrade. It was 24 at the end of the first, and 25 at the commencement of the second act. The quantity of humidity or of aqueous vapour does not increase in the same ratio. It was, however, at the expiration of two hours, augmented 30 per cent., and at the end of four hours still more heavily charged in excess of the external air. At the beginning of the performance, there was from 40 to 60 per cent. of it, which is the usual amount in pure air; at the conclusion of the performance, there was 85 per cent., the amount present when the air is most thoroughly vitiated. Carbonic acid, also, was present to six times its normal amount. The above observations were made in consequence of the frequent cases of indisposition occurring at the Maria Theatre. They might with advantage be extended to other theatres as well.

Dr Kenealy, so we learn from the Englishman, expects when he first addresses the House of Commons to be asked to sing. What his choice of a ditty may be we know not, but this is immaterial, since English amateur singing is generally conducted on the principle that the words of a song do not signify. They are, at all events, seldom heard, a circumstance which occasionally saves both singers and hearers some embarrassment. This safe system is not, however, universally carried out, and accordingly we find that, at the last meeting of the Marylebone guardians, a member of the board enquired into the character of the songs sung at one of the schools of the Union, stating as his reason for so doing that, on visiting a large charity school in London the other day, he had "found the children singing in an impassioned tone, 'Drink to me only with thine eyes, and I will pledge with mine.'" Perhaps the authorities of the school were not acquainted with the version of this song arranged for the use of children and schools by an esteemed music-master who flourished at the period of its first appearance. In this the process of expurgation was very complete, reaching its climax in the lines, "Then throw a kick within the cup and I'll not ask for wine." By means of the application of the same simple method to all, a competent knowledge of the fashionable anacreontics was combined with the preservation of the most rigid propriety. This edition was not, however, dedicated to the poet.

HERE is another anecdote, previously unknown, until published lately in the Gazetta Musicale. The first time Haydn visited France and Paris, he achieved great success as a composer and as a man. He was young, amiable, and celebrated, La cour et la ville disputed who should have him, and more than one tender heart put on mourning at his departure. Thirty years afterwards, he returned to the French Capital. His reception in high society was enthusiastic, and, at the parties to which he went, excursions into the Past were of frequent occurrence. One evening at an aristocratic gathering, a Marchioness, very much sur le retour, kept reminding Haydn of times, which, alas! could never be brought back. It appears that she had been very fond of him, and possessed a good memory. "Oh," she said, "do you remember such a passage and such an evening? Do you remember this, and do you remember that? . . . and your divine music! That sonata, for instance, you know.

"Yes! Yes," replied Haydn; "I recollect it. Unfortunately it is now:

STERNDALE BENNETT—(Extract from a letter).—All sympathetic natures were greatly affected at the loss of one who, by his works—the outpourings of his genial heart—had endeared himself to them. It is the lot of but very few to be so well known and loved, and yet, as regards his personality, to be so little known. Sterndale Bennett was an ideal being. His mind and heart were allied to things pure, lovely, and innocent. Hence his musical expressions were reflections, more or less, of the peaceful season of the year—of the summer evening, with its chaste charms, of the rivulet, the groves, the birds, the fields, and kindred things. And those persons who find their greatest delight in the bright yet sober associations of country life see one of the most æsthetic exponents of scenes invoking these associations in Sterndale Bennett; and, consequently, his death to them is as the death of an old and loved personal friend, in whose society some of their purest moments have been passed. This, too, with no knowledge whatever of the actual man, whose retiring nature sought almost seclusion, and occasioned him to shrink from the sound of popularity. To the man whose thoughts rise beyond the "commonplaces" of life, and who can, Shakespeare-like, find "sermons in stones and books in the running brooks," the death we lament will be a long-felt loss, and by such will Bennett's memory be most lovingly cherished.—F. E. P.

MILAN.—The Melodramatic Theatrical Review of February 10th, in a letter from Nice, gives the following account of Mdlle Anna Renzi, who again sustained the part of Amina in La Sonnambula, on the occasion of the benefit of Sig. Gnone. The writer remarks that Mdlle Renzi showed herself a perfect interpreter of Bellini's music, and knew how to draw forth the most enthusiastic applause of the public, particularly in the adagio of the rondo. It was a great success, and we congratulate her heartily. Mdlle Renzi will, we hear, shortly appear in Dinorah.

CONCERTS VARIOUS.

MISS PURDY'S soirée d'invitation, last Saturday evening, at the Beethoven Rooms, Harley Street, was attended by an audience consisting of the principal members of the fashionable world. The soirée, indeed, was a success in every way. Miss Purdy, who is as deserved a favourite with the "upper ten thousand" as she is with musical amateurs in general, was in excellent voice, and gave her solos in her very best manner, and her share of the concerted music like a true artist. The audience were evidently highly delighted with her performances, and expressed themselves so in an unmistakable manner Miss Purdy had the "assistance" of several artists of note, including Miss José Sherrington, Miss Drummond, Messrs Trelawny Cobham, Tesseman, and Maybrick as vocalists; and Signor Tito Mattei, Herr W GANZ, and Mons. Paque as instrumentalists, names that are a guarantee of a pleasant musical evening. Herr Ganz accompanied the vocal music on the pianoforte.

MISS KATE WINDRIDGE gave an evening concert, on Saturday last, at the concert rooms in Store Street. Miss Windridge created a great impression by her expressive singing in John Barnett's charming song, "The Parted." She was loudly and deservedly encored. Miss Edith Shield was encored after Balfe's "I dreamt that I dwell in marble halls," in Wallace's "Song of May" received warm and deserved applause, and, with Signor Ramacini, gave with effect a duet from Il Trovatore. Mr H. Kemble sang Mariani's romance, "L'ultimo pensiero," and was greatly applauded, as was also Mr F. Meldon in several bass songs. Miss C. Alguro, who possesses a contralto voice of power and sweetness, pleased by her interpretation of songs by Bellini and Donizetti. Mr F. Forest received an encore for his "Winsome Rose." Several pianoforte solos and duets were played by the Misses Lacy, Warren, Rice, and Wade, &c., whilst Mr Arthur Clegg, of the Royal Academy, and Mr Cooper gave an effective rendering of Beethoven's Andante, for violin and pianoforte, from the Sonata in G minor. Miss Blanche Roope and Mr Lansdowne Cottell presided at the pianoforte.

SCHUBERT SOCIETY.—The first concert (the forty-fifth since the formation of the society) of the ninth season, took place on Wednesday, February 21st. The first part of the programme was formed of vocal and instrumental compositions by Schubert, including Sonata for pianoforte and violoncello (first time of performance), played by Miss Florence Saunders, a talented pupil of W. H. Holmes and Herr Schuberth; a solo for violoncello; several songs—"Adina" (Miss Mabel Mostyn), "Addio" (Miss Violet Granville), "Wohin" (Miss Thekla Fischer), "The Maiden at the spinning wheel" (Miss Florence Ashton), and two songs from the "Müllerlieder" (Herr Werrenrath). The second part was miscellaneous, according to the rule of the society, opening with a Grand Trio by W. Bargeli, in which Miss Florence Saunders and Herr Schuberth were joined by Herr Van Praagh (a young Dutch violinist). The other instrumental pieces were solos for the zither by Herr Wasilief-Koch, a harmonium solo by Madame Sievers, a harp solo by Mdme Dryden, and the first movement of Mendelssohn's Concerto for the violin. Amongst the vocal novelties we may mention a new song by Mdme Sievers, sung with much expression by Miss Violet Granville, accompanied by the composer (encored); also a "ballad" by M. Odoardo Barri. Miss Bella Root made her first appearance, and sang "Waiting" (by Mr Millard); Miss Mabel Mostyn sang "The Raft" (Pinsuti); Miss Thekla Fischer, "Marinella" (Randegger); Miss Florence Ashton, a new song by Adelmann; Mdlle Uhle and Herr Werrenrath, two duets, and the latter two Danish songs. The rooms were very full, and the concert in every respect a success. The second concert will take place on the 31st, when R. Schumann's compositions will form the first part of the programme.

PROVINCIAL.

BEDFORD.—A concert was given in the Corn Exchange, on Thursday, the 25th ult., under the direction of Mr Lansdowne Cottell. Besides bringing down from London several artists, Mr Cottell had the benefit of local talent. An efficient chorus sang some part-songs and glees, &c. The graceful singing of Miss E. Shield pleased greatly. Mr F. Dunn, in Ascher's popular romance, "Alice, where art thou?" received a "double encore;" Miss Ellen Rice, in "Non più mesta," was deservedly applauded; and the singing of Mr Snazelle, who has a fine baritone voice, pleased much. Miss F. Dunn opened the second part with a brilliant solo on the pianoforte, which was followed by a solo from Mr Cottell's opera, The Archers, and several miscellaneous pieces. Miss Dunn, Messrs W. D. Sumner (organist and choirmaster) and L. Cottell presided alternately as accompanists.

BIRMINGHAM.—The "Festival Choral Society" gave a performance of Haydn's Creation and his first Mass, on Thursday, February 25th. The chorus and orchestra, under the bâton of Mr Stockley, left nothing to be desired; and the solo vocalists, Madame Otto-Alvsleben, Mr Vernon Rigby, and Mr Lewis Thomas, were highly successful. The Daily Post says: "Madame Otto-Alvsleben, on whom the principal soprano parts devolved, sang not only with spirit and fervour, but with a brilliancy and purity of intonation which left little or nothing to be desired. Her most marked effects were produced in 'The marvellous work,' and 'With verdure clad,' which latter especially impressed the audience." The Birmingham Daily Gazette expresses the same flattering opinion of Madame Alvaleben's performance. Mr Vernon Rigby was in capital voice, and sang in his best style and to the satisfaction of the audience. In the music allotted to the bass, Mr Lewis Thomas, produced great effect, and earned well-deserved applause. The audience would willingly have heard again "The heavens are telling," and Madame Otto-Alvaleben's "On mighty pens," but Mr Stockley would not accede to their wishes. Mr Stimpson presided at the organ. S. M.

CHELTENHAM.—The last of the musical entertainments of our season—writes an esteemed correspondent—took place on Saturday afternoon, at the Assembly Rooms. It was a grand Pianoforte Recital by Dr Hans von Bülow. Thanks to Messrs Dale and Forty, Cheltenham has been favoured with four recitals by this eminent pianist in comparatively a short space of time. We have had a rare treat in the varied programmes he has given us. His playing has made a great impression here; and I feel sure that were he to come ten more times, he would always receive a hearty welcome from a crowded, enthusiastic, and appreciative audience. Such magnificent playing as we listened to on Saturday will be retained in the memories of those who heard it for some time to come. Our musical friends must, I am sure, feel under a great obligation to Messrs Dale and Forty, for the many excellent concerts they have given this season, and for the admirable way in which they have been conducted. I hope sincerely that in their future concert speculations the public will support them to the utmost. R. S.

MISS ROSE HERSEE AT THE PHILHARMONIC THEATRE.

The encouragement bestowed upon the recent endeavour to establish English opera as a permanent attraction at the Philharmonic Theatre, Islington, has led the management to further efforts, and on Saturday night Vincent Wallace's most popular opera, Maritana, was produced with success before a crowded audience. The chief attraction was the rentrée of Miss Rose Hersee, who, since the death of the lamented Madame Parepa-Rosa, has been the leading representative of English operatic art, but whose successes during the last three years have chiefly been made in America and in our provinces. Her reception was enthusiastic, and throughout the opera she received the hearty applause of an audience which included a number of literary and musical celebrities. Her voice, fresh and sympathetic as ever, has gained considerably in volume; her execution is of the most finished kind, and there is a natural grace in her acting which exercises an irresistible fascination. It will be needless to go through the list of pieces in this well-known opera. Miss Hersee in the first act established her success; and "The Harp in the Air," the duet "Of Fairy Wand," and the "Fortune-telling scene," elicited prolonged applause. In the second act the soprano has little to do; but the third act opens with one of the best airs in the opera—"Scenes that are brightest." This was beautifully sung; and Miss Hersee, who had firmly declined previously-offered encores, was compelled to repeat the last verse. In the duet, "O Maritana," and in the short finale, she was equally successful, and in the latter she introduced a staccato passage extending to F in alt, executed with the apparent ease which enhances the enjoyment of her finished vocalization. There are few artists on the Italian stage who can surpass the highly-cultivated vocalization of this young lady, while her acting is full of dramatic power, combined with natural grace. It is, therefore, not surprising that the welcome given to her was of the heartiest kind; and it is to be hoped that her return to the metropolitan stage may help to brighten the prospects of English operatic art.

Mr Nordblom, as Don Cæsar de Bazan, proved himself to be the best acting tenor on the modern stage, and sang with wonderful dramatic energy. Mr Frank Celli made a successful début as Don Jose, and the rôles of Lazarillo and the King were filled by Miss Manetti and Mr Marler. Great praise is due to the conductor, Mr Eayres, who has done wonders with the chorus and band under his charge. The performance was needlessly lengthened by the tedious intervals between the acts, which should be curtailed in future. Maritana will be repeated—with Miss Rose Hersee as Maritana—on Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday, and Saturday next.

MUSICAL CRITICISM.

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

SIR,—On the subject of Musical Criticism, to which the "leader" in your present week's impression refers, I should like, with your courteous permission, to make an observation or two. Mr B. D. Allen's letter to Dwight's Journal of Music, which occasioned your judicious comments, in suggesting perfection as the standard to which all artistic effort should be referred—quite regardless of the consequences that might result from the unedifying of those performers who, in hunting after criticisms upon their doings, expected to be edified and flattered—pointed to a standard which fails to get what it certainly needs—an adequate definition. If a critic is to censure without qualification everything falling short of this ideal, one condition at least is essential—that the critic, at the outset, favour his readers with his notion of perfection; else art, artists, and critics in general will be, as it were, in the clouds. This condition satisfied, it will be in the power of professors of art to judge of the worth or the accuracy of the standard held up. Assuming the test to be good, the criticism, indeed, will be most valuable. The critic, being an artist—though, perhaps, not a practical one—and loving the art, will point out the defects of the performance which is the subject of his remarks. The rules will be given, and the instances of violation; and in this way the artist—for I am supposing him to be one, and that his doings are not beneath criticism—will know how and in what respects he has failed. He and all the other readers of the criticism will be aware of at least some of the rules of the art, the whole of which in combination constitute what we understand to be perfection. The critic will then be a true teacher, claiming and securing the high regard, not only of his contemporaries, but of those who come after him; performers will derive great benefit through his valuable instrumentality, and the general public will find instruction of infinitely more value to them than any they could obtain from the presentation to them of the best composition in the best possible manner. In art it is not as in morals—"example is better than precept." Without a knowledge of the rules of art, the public may approve without knowing why—and disapprove; while it might happen that, possessed of an acquaintance with some of the rules, the agreeable and the disagreeable sentiment might change places; and, in addition to a greater discrimination being shown by the public, art and artists would be gainers. If, too, by any chance, the canons set forth at the outset of a review for the purpose of showing their violation be not altogether recognized, the artist or artists would be competent to call the judgment in question, and all this could not but tend to the advancement and the interest of art. I am, Sir, very obediently Yours, 27th Feb., 1875. F. E. PENNA.

WAIFS.

It is announced that Mdme Carvalho has left the Opéra Comique for the Grand Opéra.

Mdlle Emma Albani sailed from New York for England, on Saturday, Feb. 13th, in the Abyssinia.

M. Lamoureux is about to bring out a new sacred work, entitled Eve, the composition of M. Massenet.

Herr Rubinstein is expected in Paris about April 20th, for the last rehearsals of his oratorio, La Tour de Babel.

M. Oberthür has gone to Prague, to play at the fourth concert of the Conservatoire, and returns to London next week.

It is rumoured that Mr Max Strakosch purports giving Italian opera performances, at cheap prices, in the New York Academy.

M. Pitron has taken the Opéra Comique Theatre, and a French company, under his direction, will commence a series of performances at Easter.—ATLAS.

Mr Celli is especially engaged to play Don Josè, in Maritana, and Count Arnheim in The Bohemian Girl, at the Royal Philharmonic Theatre, after which he will make a tour, as principal baritone, with the Carl Rosa Grand Opera Company.

Le Ménestrel bids us look for a new setting of Romeo and Juliet (Les Amants de Vérone) at the opening of Mr Mapleson's grand opera-house. It is the work of the Marquis d'Ivry, who "read" it to Mdme Nilsson during her late visit to Paris.

St Patrick at Tara.—A grand performance of the above work is announced for the 15th inst., in the Exhibition Palace, Dublin, under the patronage of His Excellency the Lord Lieutenant. The orchestra and chorus consisting of five hundred performers will be conducted by the composer, Professor Glover.

Special services are being held at St Anne's Church, Soho, during the present Lenten season, which offer some features of interest. Each Sunday evening an efficient orchestra is used, in conjunction with the organ, to accompany the Services and Anthem—the latter being the famous Cantata known as Gottes Zeit ist die allerbeste Zeit ("God's time is the best"). These services are very largely attended.

The musical arrangements of the festival of the Society of Ancient Britons on St David's day were of an exceptional and purely national character, and were given under the direction of Mr Brinley Richards. A special feature of the evening's music was the performance on triple-stringed Welsh harps (the earliest national musical instrument of the Principality) by Gruffydd and his daughter, Y Fronfraith Fach, both attired in the Welsh costume, and whose services had been kindly lent by Lady Llanover. During the evening the secretary of the society announced subscriptions to the charity amounting to upwards of £900, which amount included 100 guineas from her Majesty.

Dr Spark, of Leeds, has been in town during the past week, completing arrangements on behalf of the Leeds Madrigal and Motet Society, of which he is the conductor, with principal vocalists, orchestral players, &c., for the performance of Sir Michael Costa's Eli, which is to be given in the Town Hall, Leeds, on Thursday, March 18th. With the Yorkshire chorus, which so delighted everyone at the Festival in October last, a fine band, good principals, and Dr Spark at the organ, it is reasonable to expect that the Leeds people will have the pleasure of listening to a very fine performance of this favourite oratorio, given for the first time in the metropolis of the West Riding.

We are somewhat anxious as to the results of the promised rendition of Handel's Israel in Egypt on Tuesday week, minus orchestral accompaniments. We know that the organ in St George's Hall is capable of producing extraordinary effects, and we also believe that Mr Best is able to get more out of a "kist o' whustles" than any living organist; yet it is not without some misgivings that we look forward to the coming of the flies and other nasty insects even at Mr Best's bidding. In some of the choruses, however, the massiveness of the construction will prove admirably adapted for the St George's Hall organ, and in these the orchestra will possibly not be so much missed.—Liverpool Post.

There is some talk of a performance of Handel's Messiah in the Victoria Hall at the conclusion of the visit of Messrs Moody and Sankey. The suggested executants are the Liverpool musical Society and Representative Choirs, which would jointly number about 300 voices. If the scheme comes to anything at all, why not develop it to its utmost extent, and enlist the vocal aid of every Society in the town and district capable of assisting in so great an undertaking? Thus a chorus of nearly, if not quite, 700 voices might be recruited; and we believe, if the proceeds of such a concert were to be devoted to charity, no one would think of refusing any support it lay in his power to give.—Liverpool Post.

The discussion in the House of Lords on the question of theatre and music-hall licenses in connection with the Ash Wednesday difficulty and the illegality of morning performances at concert-rooms was postponed until yesterday, when the Duke of St Albans was to ask the following questions:—1st. Why those theatres which are under the Lord Chamberlain's jurisdiction should be closed on Ash Wednesday, while other metropolitan and the provincial theatres are not so restricted. 2nd. Why music halls on the Surrey side of the river are allowed to open on Ash Wednesday, when those on the Middlesex side are closed. 3rd. Whether her Majesty's Government will amend the clause in the Act 25th, Geo. II., cap. 36, prohibiting concerts and musical entertainments from being given before five in the afternoon.

In the will of the late Mr John Mitchell, of Old Bond street, Bolton street, Piccadilly, and Coppins, Iver Heath, Bucks, the testator bequeaths to the Prince of Wales the clock presented to him by the present Duke of Wellington, formerly the property of the late Duke; and to the Princess of Wales, the small marble bust of the Queen by Professor Boehm (the only one executed, as stated, by her Majesty's permission), as an humble acknowledgement of their Royal Highnesses' goodness to him. There are specific bequests of the testimonial presented to him at the St James's Theatre, and of the articles given to him by King Louis Philippe, the Duke of Brunswick, the Emperor Napoleon III., Mr George Peabody, the Nepaulese Ambassador, and Prince Demidoff, to his son and two daughters; the snuffbox formerly belonging to Sir Henry Bishop he gives to Sir Julius Benedict.

As every fact connected with the late Sterndale Bennett possesses an interest for our readers, we gladly note the following characteristic illustration of his kindly disposition, as supplied in a letter in the Guardian of Wednesday last, from the Rev. Thomas Darling. Mr Darling says:—"A circumstance connected with the decease of that excellent musician, Dr Sterndale Bennett, ought, I think, to be generally known. It was his wont to finish the week's labours by giving a free lesson to three girls from the Clergy Orphan School, the house of which lay hard by his own dwelling-place in St John's-wood. The lesson thus given on Saturday, January 23, proved to be his last act in his vocation and ministry. The following day he was seized with the sickness unto death. His three scholars were, together with the matron of the school, especially invited by the committee of the Royal Academy of Music to attend at the burial in Westminster Abbey."—Choir.

Mr Browning's New Poem.—We understand that Mr Browning's new poem is not, as has been stated, a translation of any work of Aristophanes, but an Aristophanic poem, in which the Greek poet—or the English one in his person—says some things about himself that Mr Browning thinks have not been said, though they want saying. The book is more than half through the press and is expected within a fortnight.—Academy.

"It chanced within the short month of February, by a most unusual coincidence of moriality, twice had the gates of the Abbey been opened to pay the last honours to two men widely apart in all else, but alike in the share they took in unfolding and exemplifying this divine law; the one the acknowledged chief of the English musicians of our time, the other the acknowledged head of those who, whether here or elsewhere, have devoted their talents to the study of the history of our mother earth. Of all the branches of art and letters, none more reveals the hidden capacities of the human soul, or the fearful and wonderful structure of the human frame than the slow process through which from the most barbarous sounds, the spirit which brooded over the harp of David, and inspired the genius of Beethoven and Mendelssohn, has gained its majesty and glory. This passing allusion to a great musician, this indication of the latent capacities for spiritual emotion brought out by abstract and inanimate things—elements seemingly without form and void—was no unfitting prelude to the consideration of the study of nature of which he who has just gone was so bright an example."—Dean Stanley at Westminster Abbey.

Chance Playgoers.—Managers of theatres are awakening to the fact that the same protection should be granted to the stalls that from time immemorial has been accorded to the pit. No manager would be so rash as to advertise seats in the front row of the pit a month in advance. If people want seats, they wait till the doors open, and secure them. But in these days of long runs, the advantage is almost denied the stalls. It is not every one who determines that he will go and see a particular play within a fortnight. He may be in the humour to-day; but to-morrow three weeks the east wind may be blowing, and he may repudiate the idea of visiting a theatre. With many persons, going to the play occurs to them directly after dinner—an impulse of the moment; especially with country people, who imagine they have nothing to do but to pay, and at once be admitted to any place of entertainment. If they go to the theatre and find every stall booked, it is rather a hard case. Therefore, it is with satisfaction we note that, at a certain crowded theatre, special stalls are reserved for payment at the doors. This affords chance customers an opportunity of witnessing a performance equally well with those who can decide upon a visit four weeks in advance.

It is rare fun to see a man kicking against the pricks, and to observe how he attempts to put on a self-satisfied face when writing under self-inflicted torture. An anonymous writer in the analytical programme of Mr Bache's concert, while faintly pretending that he cares nothing for criticism, had the bad taste to assail the Daily Telegraph in coarse terms because its critic had dared to doubt the expediency of topping and tailing one of Weber's Polonaises, jamming it on to another Polonaise and giving it the name of Weber's Polonaise Brillante "arranged" by Liszt. The anonymous writer is not likely to disturb the equanimity of the Daily Telegraph, its editor, or critic, even if in his attack he had not betrayed the most lamentable ignorance of the subject. * * * * Even cymbals and triangles were invented in Weber's time, and if his Polonaises had been intended to have been accompanied by orchestra, Weber, who was at least as sound a master of orchestration as Liszt, would have done it for himself. The Wagnerites tried all they knew on Thursday to pass off the rubbish as the true metal, and I am sorry they did not have the satisfaction of partially succeeding. Liszt's edition was played first, and being applauded, Mr Walter Bache sat down at the piano, and gave us undiluted Weber, or, at least, Weber as undiluted as he was able to give it. * * * However, it was Mr Bache's fate to be applauded, and twice recalled; so that even the satisfaction of obtaining by means of free-handed abuse a temporary triumph was denied. The laugh was in fact turned against the would-be clever ones.—Figaro, March 3.

Venice.—Affairs at the Teatro della Fenice have not gone on too well this season. Il Guarany was succeeded by Dinorah, but the latter was so badly performed that it was soon withdrawn, and Il Guarany reappeared in the bills. Then came Poliuto, for a few evenings, with Sig. Tamagno as tenor. At length, as already announced in these columns, Selvaggia, the new and eagerly expected opera by Sig. Schira was produced on the 20th, with most decided success, although the execution was, as a whole, far from doing justice to the undeniable beauties of the work. The mise-en-scène was pretty good and no more. The talented composer, under whose personal direction the opera was got up, came forward twenty times in obedience to as many calls from the audience.

COPENHAGEN.—La Dame Blanche has been produced at the new Theatre Royal. Madlle Hausen made an interesting Anna, and M. Christoffersen was an efficient George Brown. But the operatic repertory is still greatly limited by want of scenery. Did this want not exist, five or six other stock operas would ere now have been given. However, Herr Gullich, a German, and M. Algrenson, a Swedish artist, are working as hard as they can to provide a remedy for so unsatisfactory a state of things.—An Italian operatic company have been singing at the old Theatre Royal, but without creating any great impression.

ONTARIO (Canada).—Tuesday, Jan. 12, had been a day long looked forward to at Hellmuth Ladies' College, as the occasion on which the medals awarded in June last by His Excellency Earl Dufferin, Governor-General of Canada, were to be presented to the successful competitors in the last general examination in this institution. The Bishop and Mrs Hellmuth had kindly deferred their departure for the South for a few days, that they might be present at and take part in the proceedings, which commenced with a concert in two parts. The following is the programme:—PART FIRST: Overture, "Hebrides" (Misses Clinton, Chittenden, Whitney and Burnett)—Mendelssohn; Song, "The Shadow Land" (Miss Brooke)—Pinsuti; Piano Solo, "Funeral March" (Miss Murphy)—Chopin; Part Song, "Chorus of Houris" (the Choir)—Schumann; Piano Solo, "La Fontaine" (Miss Burnett)—Mayer; Anthem, "Let us return" (the Choir)—Macfarren. PART SECOND: Duet (two pianos), Andante and Variations (Misses Chittenden and Clinton)—Schumann; Song, "Fly forth, gentle dove" (Miss Ivins)—Pinsuti; Piano Solo, "La Fille du Regiment" (Miss Chittenden)—Jaell; Song, "Sognai" (Miss Murphy)—Schira; Quartette, Andante and Mazurka (Misses Clinton, Chittenden, Burnett and Whitney)—Chopin; Part Song, "The Spinning Maidens" (the Choir)—Wagner; Finale, "God save the Queen." The College having been only re-opened barely a week, it was a matter of very general surprise that the programme should have been so perfectly rendered. Both the instrumental and vocal pieces were quite up to the usual standard; the playing was most creditable; that of Miss Kate Chittenden, the bronze medallist, fully sustaining her previous reputation as a finished performer. It rarely falls to our lot to hear such a rendering of Schumann's duet as that by the Misses Clinton and Chittenden. The songs, by Miss Murphy, Miss Ivins, and Miss L. Brooke, were given with taste and sweetness, and received due applause; whilst the choir gave general satisfaction. Between the parts of the concert the following recitations were given with much effect:—Lady Clare (Miss Ella Peters)—Tennyson; Selection (Miss Gertrude Molson)—German. The concert having been concluded, the Principal presented to the Bishop the medals awarded by the Governor, on a silver salver, together with the letters from His Excellency's secretary. As the recipients came forward, the Bishop addressed them in his usual kind and happy manner. He bore testimony, in the case of Miss Lewis, on whom the silver medal was bestowed, to the position she had won both in the College and in the esteem of all who knew her, by her high ability and blameless conduct; whilst, as regards Miss Chittenden, who had carried off the bronze medal, he expressed his sincere appreciation of her musical talent, and his confidence in her future success as a first-class performer. To both, as well as to the pupils at large, he spoke encouragingly and sympathizingly as to their future career. Here the proceedings would have closed, but as His Lordship was soon to leave the city for the space of some months, for the benefit of his health, both the pupils and the College staff had determined to present addresses. That by the pupils was read by Miss Lottie Parsons, and that from the staff of professors and teachers by Miss Clinton, who has been in the College from its opening. The Bishop having replied to the addresses in appropriate terms, bade all the members of the College an affectionate farewell.—Huron Recorder.

George.

I never saw him; but I know
He had the luck some time ago
A chain to forge, [tion
Which binds a gentle maid's affec-
About each tender recollection
Of Mr George.

For if you mention him she sighs,
And drops her meditative eyes,
And thinks of Georgie,
Whom many men would like to bore
With blade or ball, and in his gore
Have quite an orgie.

And 'tis enough to make them wish
To have his heart upon a dish,
And on it gorge,
To hear the tender kind of way
In which the damsel oft will say
The name of George.

And yet it can't compare with names
Like Wilkin, Benjamin, or James,
Or Hezekiah; [be
Then think how nice my name would
If only once thus whispered she—
"My Jedediah!"

THE VOICE & SINGING
BY
ADOLFO FERRARI.
THE FORMATION AND CULTIVATION OF THE VOICE FOR SINGING
Price 12s.
London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, REGENT STREET, W.
"The remarkable qualities of this book are the author's freedom from conventional trammels, the strong sense of his opinions, and the novelty yet evident soundness of his precepts; his work has consequently come into general use as a manual of vocal instruction."—Daily News.

DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE,
For invigorating and enriching the voice, and removing affections of the throat.
DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE is universally acknowledged to be the most valuable remedy for sore throat, hoarseness and relaxed throat. It should always be taken before singing or reciting, as it strengthens the vocal organs. It is most extensively prescribed by the faculty for the throat and voice. Dr Lewis of Basingstoke says he finds them most efficacious, and in Dr Copland's Dictionary of Practical Medicine (Longman & Co.), they are strongly recommended at pages 872 and 1492. They are used by all the greatest vocalists and orators in Europe, and have been established over a quarter of a century. Testimonials from Patti, Grisi, Lablache, Santley, &c. Sold in boxes, 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. by all Chemists throughout the United Kingdom and the Colonies.

"A LOVER'S SONG."
A LOVER'S SONG. Composed expressly for, and sung by, Mr VERNON RIGBY. The Poetry by EDWARD COPPING. The Music by LOUIS DIEHL (Composer of "The Mariner," &c.). "Mr Vernon Rigby next reappeared, and sang 'A Lover's Song,' expressly composed for him by Louis Diehl. Both the words and music of the song are simple, and they received ample justice from the singer. An encore was demanded, and Mr Rigby repeated the last verse."—Birmingham Daily Post. "We must compliment Mr Rigby on his rendering of 'A Lover's Song.' This charming melody, by Louis Diehl, is worthy of Mendelssohn himself, and Mr Rigby seemed to catch the exact feeling without overdoing it."—Manchester Evening News. Price 4s. ARTHUR SULLIVAN'S NEW SONG,
"THOU ART WEARY,"
WORDS BY ADELAIDE PROCTOR.
MUSIC BY ARTHUR SULLIVAN.
SUNG BY
MISS ANTOINETTE STERLING
AT THE
MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

"The singer was Miss Antoinette Sterling, who, always heartily admired in those German ballads, for which she exhibits so marked a sympathy, introduced in a group fou. of Schumann's most graceful contributions to the Lieder repertory, and, later in the evening, a new song by Mr Arthur Sullivan, 'Thou art weary' (set to words by Adelaide Proctor)—one of the most charming recent emanations from the pen of our gifted compatriot."—The Times, Nov. 10.

"Miss Sterling was the vocalist, and sang, in addition to selections from Schumann, a new song by Arthur Sullivan, entitled, 'Thou art weary,' which is one of the most beautiful and thoughtful effusions of the composer's graceful music."—Daily Telegraph, Nov 12.

"Miss Antoinette Sterling was the vocalist. In the second part she introduced a new song by Mr Sullivan, an admirable setting for a contralto voice of some very touching lines by the late Miss Adelaide Proctor, addressed by a poor mother to her starving child, the burden being—

'Sleep, my darling, thou art weary;
God is good, but life is dreary.'

The song exactly suited Miss Sterling's voice and style, and it will assuredly become as great a favourite as 'Will he come,' to which it is a worthy pendant, and the words of which are also by Miss Proctor."—Standard, Nov. 12.

"Miss Antoinette Sterling repeated Mr Sullivan's new song, 'Thou art weary,' a second hearing of which has confirmed our good opinion of it."—Standard, Nov. 16.

"At the concert on Monday, Miss Sterling had introduced a series of charming Lieder by Schumann, and a new song by Mr Arthur Sullivan, 'Sleep, my darling, thou art weary,' an admirable setting of Miss Proctor's poem, 'Hush, I cannot bear to see thee,' which, like everything Miss Proctor wrote, was well adapted for, and, in fact, seemed to invite musical treatment. Her verses have inspired Mr Sullivan with a genuine melody, of which the refrain is particularly remarkable; and the song, both at Monday's and Saturday's concert, pleased so much that Miss Sterling was called upon to repeat it."—Pall Mall Gazette, Nov. 17.

"Miss Sterling sang discreetly and sympathetically four of Schumann's 'Dichterliebe' (Nos. 1, 2, 7, and 8); but came off still better in a new song by Mr A. Sullivan, who has set words by Adelaide Proctor, 'Thou art weary,' the dying consolation of a starved mother to her child, the refrain of which is—

'Sleep, my darling, thou art weary;
God is good, but life is dreary.'

It is a painful theme; but the composer has treated it with such pathos that the air tells powerfully."—Athenæum, Nov. 14.

"The vocalist was Miss Sterling, who sang four songs by Schumann (Nos. 1, 2, 7, and 8 of the 'Dichterliebe'), and a new song, entitled 'Thou art weary,' written by Miss Adelaide Proctor. The words are good, and have been fitted to charming and expressive music by Mr Arthur Sullivan, who has added a pianoforte accompaniment worthy his high reputation, and worth listening to for its own sake."—Observer, Nov. 15.

Published in the keys of D minor and F minor, Price 4s.

ARTHUR SULLIVAN'S NEW SONG,
"TENDER AND TRUE,"
SUNG BY
MISS EDITH WYNNE
AT THE
MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS, ST JAMES'S HALL.

"The vocalist was Miss Edith Wynne, who sang a new song, 'Tender and True,' by Arthur Sullivan, the beauty of which, aided by a most tasteful rendering, elicited an encore."—Daily Telegraph, January 13.

"Mr Sullivan's graceful song—a novelty—was rendered by Miss Edith Wynne with much refined expression; and the applause which followed necessitated its entire repetition."—Daily News, January 13.

"A very expressive new song, by Mr A. Sullivan, 'Tender and True,' was sung with such effect by Miss Edith Wynne that it had to be repeated."—Illustrated London News, January 16.

"Miss Edith Wynne, who gave, in her own genuine and expressive manner, a graceful new song, 'Tender and True,' by Mr Arthur Sullivan, which was encored, and repeated."—Graphic, January 16.

TO THE MEMBERS OF THE SENATE OF THE UNIVERSITY OF CAMBRIDGE.

GENTLEMEN,—The long list of influential names forming Mr MACFARREN'S Committee appears to me to indicate a desire on the part of the Senate for that gentleman's success little short of unanimous.

In deference to that implied desire, I beg leave to withdraw my name from the list of Candidates.

Whilst thanking those gentlemen who have interested themselves on my behalf, permit me to add that should the promise of Mr MACFARREN'S election be realized, the result will be scarcely less gratifying to me than would have been my own success.—Faithfully yours, J. BARNBY.

ALFRED HOLMES'S JEANNE D'ARC.

There is very much to be praised in the "dramatic symphony," entitled Jeanne d'Arc, which formed the novelty at Saturday week's concert in the Crystal Palace. Mr Alfred Holmes, its composer, like his brother, Mr Henry Holmes, studied composition, as well as the violin, under Spohr. The highly finished duet-playing of the brothers Holmes, especially in the works of their honoured master, years ago, created a marked sensation, and is still remembered. For some time past Mr Alfred Holmes, devoting himself mainly to composition, has lived a great deal abroad, so that the artistic union of the two brothers has in a measure been dissolved. On the Continent, especially in Russia and France, Mr Alfred Holmes fairly stands his ground, some of his important works having been well received and favourably noticed both in St Petersburgh and in Paris. Jeanne d'Arc is a subject by this time pretty well worn; but, if composers believe they can find some new way of treating it, the right to essay their powers is incontestable. The poem supplied to Mr Holmes, in the original French, is from the pen of Madame Alfred Holmes, his wife; and an excellent English version, made for home performance by Mr Joseph Bennett, was the one used on Saturday. The poem is divided into five parts. The first part opens with a pastoral symphony for orchestra which (like the introduction to M. Gounod's Jeanne d'Arc and Sterndale Bennett's preface to his sonata, The Maid of Orleans) may be supposed to illustrate the peaceful life of the afterwards-inspired shepherdess. A chorus follows, descriptive of the horror of the English invasion and the despair of the people. The second part is introduced by an orchestral prelude, which the composer entitles "Misery and oppression of France." At the end of this Jeanne d'Arc comes forward, and, in a recitative and air ("I trust in you, O holy voices!"), expresses her resolution to undertake the task supernaturally imposed upon her—to leave her village home for ever, and devote her energies to the rescue of her country from the yoke of its oppressors. In Part 3 we are transported to the French court, where, in a jovial chorus, "See our master the King," the courtiers welcome their master back from the chase to the feast. The revelries, however, are stopped by the apparition of Jeanne, who implores the King to draw the sword on behalf of France in her impending emergency. Jeanne at the same time reveals the sanctity of her mission. The King and his courtiers, sceptical at first, ultimately persuaded by the untutored eloquence of the Maid, proclaim in chorus their faith in her mission and their resolve to follow her into the battle-field. She forthwith leads them on; and this affords occasion for an orchestral movement, "tempo di Marcia," culminating in a highly-wrought illustration of the deliverance of Orleans from the English. Then ensues a chorus of victory—

"Noel! Noel!
Our country's cause shall triumph."

—succeeded by an orchestral piece, "Faith and Earnestness," descriptive of the entry of Jeanne d'Arc into Rheims. A "Te Deum" brings the fourth part appropriately to a close. Here, while the Maiden Champion of France gives expression to her own feelings in a solo—"God, who now guardeth our country" (apart from the rest), the chorus sing the "Te Deum Laudamus"—the solo being in English and the chorus in Latin by no means weakening the general effect. The idea, in fact, if not without precedent, is developed in a thoroughly ingenious manner. Part 4 is ushered in by an orchestral prelude—"Treason"—the significance of which is speedily explained by a chorus—

"Ha, ha! to thee we drink, Joan of Arc is in our power"— of the soldiers of Burgundy, exulting in the capture of the heroic maiden, now within their grasp. Jeanne, in a solo, "The end has come," dwells on the treason which has betrayed her into the hands of the enemy, and the terrible death that awaits her—finding consolation, nethertheless, in the fact that she has been the chosen means of her country's salvation, and resigning herself meekly to her fate. At the commencement of Part 5, Jeanne is prisoner in the Tour de Rouen, the orchestra playing a solemn slow movement—"Largo lamentabile (?). Our heroine prays fervently in her distress—"Stretch forth, O God, thine arm of might, and save me;" but her supplications are arrested by a vision of angels, similar to that which at the beginning had caused her to believe she was elected by miraculous interposition to be the saviour of France. She listens with ecstasy; her courage revives she believes she will once again see her village home, and puts all her trust in Heaven. At this juncture the Chief Inquisitor comes to the front, and, warning Jeanne of her impending fate, bids her abjure her errors and repent. Jeanne, however, defies the threats of the Inquisitor, and persists in asserting that she is the chosen envoy from above; whereupon the Inquisitor anathematizes her, and proclaims her doomed to the stake—deaf to her heart-rending appeal, "Death! and so young! have pity upon me." A funeral march is then played by the orchestra, as Jeanne d'Arc is conducted to the scaffold. The concluding scene is "The Martyrdom." In a triple chorus (admirably designed), the Women of the People, the Soldiers, and the Men of the People, simultaneously deplore the act about to be accomplished; and lastly, in her torment, the Maid of Orleans bids "farewell" to France, and commits her soul to God.

It must be admitted that Mr Alfred Holmes has in this instance enjoyed every advantage that a well-planned and skilfully laid out poem could afford him. The action goes on, step by step, from beginning to end, with logical consistency and ever-increasing interest. Of the music we shall not attempt a detailed account until we have an opportunity of becoming more closely acquainted with it. It leaves, however—and this may be stated without reserve—a general impression that Mr Holmes is possessed of unquestionable dramatic power; that, in a technical sense, he is a thorough master of his materials; that he writes well for voices, both in solo and chorus; and that his knowledge of orchestral resources is very considerable—so much so, indeed, that he is apt to display it so profusely as to make the orchestra often play an unduly important part, and thus expose himself to the charge of over-colouring. This excess must be toned down, because its free indulgence leads to monotony. That Mr Holmes knows well the signification of varied treatment is evident. Each incident in Jeanne d'Arc is illustrated in a manner distinguishing it from all the rest; and nowhere is this more forcibly demonstrated than in the scene of the interview between Jeanne and the Inquisitor, which might have been imagined and planned much after the same style by Meyerbeer himself—the great master of striking contrasts and musico-scenic effect. But there are other instances in this "dramatic symphony" (why "symphony" we are at a loss to guess) in which the same power is exhibited in different degrees, but with hardly less felicity. For the present, however, we must conclude with saying that Jeanne d'Arc, on the whole, leaves such an impression as to induce those who have heard it once to hear it again. All was done that could possibly be done by the authorities at the Crystal Palace to give the composer every chance of success; an increased orchestra, the Crystal Palace chorus (the continued progress of which is worth noting), the solo singers, Madame Alvsleben and Mr Whitney, and, last, not least, Mr Manns, the conductor, exerting themselves to the utmost, with results in proportion. The new work was listened to throughout with marked attention; but there was very little applause during the performance, the audience reserving the emphatic expression of their approval for the end, when there was a general call for the composer, who rose and acknowledged the compliment from his place in the balcony. We shall doubtless hear more of Jeanne d'Arc.

The other pieces in the programme were the Prometheus overture of Beethoven, a rich and varied selection from Schubert's incidental music to Rosamunde, which delights more and more at each new hearing (the quaint and simple shepherd's melody being encored); "Qui sdegno" (Il Flauto Magico) sung extremely well by Mr Whitney; and Rossini's brilliant overture to La Gazza Ladra, played to perfection by the orchestra.

COLOGNE.—Mad. Lucca has appeared at the Stadttheater as Mrs Ford, in Die lustigen Weiber von Windsor; Margarethe, in Faust; and Zerlina, in Fra Diavolo. Though the prices of admission were nearly doubled, the house was crammed every evening.

CAIRO.—It appears that, despite all the reports circulated to the contrary, the Khedive will not discontinue the grant to the Italian Opera-house, but will contribute two millions of francs towards the expenses next year. Signor Niccolini is engaged. Among the artists re-engaged are Signore Waldmann, Smerosohl, Signori Fancelli and Medini.

MUSICIANS WHO HAVE DIED AWAY.*

By Joseph Seiler.

II.

ANTONIO SALIERI.

The once so highly celebrated Salieri, whose Axur his contemporaries placed far above Don Juan, and whose Grotta di Trofonio they considered superior to Figaro, is now scarcely known to most musicians even by name. The legend only is heard now and then that the envious Salieri poisoned young Mozart, and, at an advanced age, himself believed in this misdeed. This is all that people can now tell you about Antonio Salieri.

And yet Salieri's importance was at one time great, and his relative position to Gluck and Mozart a peculiar one. It is well worth while examining more nearly the history of his life and of his works.

Herr von Mosel calls Salieri a philosophic composer. In so far as Salieri always honestly strove to pourtray characters and situations in conformity with nature, to declaim rightly and expressively, and never to sacrifice truth to bravura or to the desire of merely tickling the ear—in so far, the denomination of a "philosophical composer" may be well founded. Whether our composer achieved, either wholly or partially, what he so conscientiously endeavoured to do—that is another question.

Salieri was the friend and imitator of Gluck. Hence his recitatives are vigorous and full of expression, while the wretched Secco, especially in his later works, is generally avoided. In the airs, also, he follows, it is true, Gluck's declamatory tendency—but as an Italian. He cannot suppress his delight in the bel canto. But as Mozart's and even Cimarosa's originality fails him, his airs, especially when there are many in succession, soon become wearisome. The solo songs alone, and, above all, the grand bass airs in Axur, constitute a pleasing exception. The homophonous choruses, moreover, and the concerted pieces in this opera, being more carefully worked out than those in his other productions, are often grandly effective. This is the reason why the above opera is the only one in which he stands perhaps on an equality with Méhul, that other imitator of Gluck. But we must not forget that Méhul, a Frenchman, sang in Paris fiery revolutionary hymns, while Salieri lived comfortably at the Court of Vienna, and composed mostly comic pieces, for which he himself wrote the text.

Salieri's accompaniment, invariably subordinated to the melody, is always thin and sparse. In addition to the quartet, he employs scarcely anything save flutes, oboes and bassoons—French horns seldom; still seldomer trumpets or kettle-drums; and never trombones. Clarinets appear only in his later scores. On the other hand, he avails himself, frequently with fine effect, of an instrument neglected by Mozart and, therefore, undeservedly fallen into oblivion, the corno inglese. To quote once more Herr von Mosel: "Thus he regarded the instrumental accompaniment only as the means to an end: that, namely, of strengthening the effect of what was declaimed. Generally in good taste, often admirably characteristic, and always simple, it served him merely to support, and, strictly speaking, to accompany the melody, and supply that expression which cannot be infused in the vocal part. If, perhaps, after the manner of the older Italian masters, it appears here and there too simple, this defect is more than compensated by its never covering the melody, and by the vocal part not being drowned in the flood of the raging orchestra."

All this sounds very fine and edifying, but Herr von Mosel has here, perchance, unconsciously and against his will, given us the reason why maestro Salieri must necessarily find a place sooner or later, "amongst those who have died away," while the more vigorous Méhul, at least with his principal work, is still to be found on the stage, and Cimarosa's Matrimonio Segreto proved even most recently that it possesses a vitality not to be impaired.

So much by way of preface to explain how matters stand. Let us now examine somewhat more nearly Salieri's life and labours.

Antonio Salieri was born on the 19th August, 1750, in Legnano, a Venetian fortress. His father, a well-to-do tradesman, gave him the advantage of a very good education, which included among other things music, namely singing and the violin. The elder of the Brothers Fernando, a pupil of the famous Tartini, and Giuseppe Simoni, organist at the Cathedral of Legnano, were his earliest masters. At this period, he displayed as great a partiality for art as—for all kinds of sugarwork. He remained, until his end, faithful to both these likings; and, if we find many of his melodies far too sweet, we must, perhaps, seek the reason in his youthful taste, of which he himself in his later years could tell amusing anecdotes.

After the death of his parents, he went, thanks to the kindness of the Cavaliere Moncenigo, in 1766, to Venice, where he zealously studied composition under Pescetti and singing under the tenor Pacini. He was fortunate enough, also, to enjoy the instruction of Guglielmi, then stopping in Venice.

A few months later there arrived in Venice Florian Gassmann, Imperial Chamber Composer, to finish and produce his opera of Achille in Sciro. At the rehearsals he became acquainted, through the instrumentality of the above-named Pacini, with Salieri, then sixteen. Being pleased with the boy's singing and pianoforte-playing, he asked the Cavaliere Moncenigo, in whose house Antonio had hitherto resided, to allow him to take the boy to Vienna, where he promised to perfect him in composition. Moncenigo consented, and thus young Salieri accompanied Gassmann, in 1766, to Vienna, which city, except a few times when he was travelling, he never again left.

Gassmann now judiciously parcelled out his pupil's time. Besides a master of German and a master of French, the Abbate Pietro Tommasi came every day to teach young Salieri Latin, Italian poetry, and mathematics. A Bohemian, whose name Salieri afterwards forgot, gave him lessons in general bass, score reading, and violin playing. Gassmann himself began with his protégé, to whom, in truth, he was a second father, the study of counterpoint and fugue, according to the Gradus ad Parnassum of old Fux, of which Salieri had to make a written translation, word for word, into German. At the same time, Gassmann most strictly forbade his essaying original composition before he had completely mastered all the rules and precepts, of which there was then an unlimited number. As Antonio disregarded the prohibition, Gassmann carefully locked up all music paper out of his reach.

After a time, Gassmann took his pupil to the Court Concerts, where Salieri sang in the chorus or played the violin or piano. Gassmann then took him to the theatre, so that the boy might practically realise what he had learnt at home from books and scores. When, subsequently, the noble Gassmann was dead, leaving his family in straitened circumstances, Salieri strove richly to return all the benefits he had received.

FLOOD TIDE.

The fisher's wife looked from her door
Across the shining sand,
Her eyes against the level light
Were shaded by her hand.
She heard, like winds 'mid autumn leaves,
The bright waves lap the strand.

Undriven came the lowing cows
Along the winding way;
Her good man's boat against the wind
Was tacking up the bay.
She saw him stand, with rope in hand,
And cast the sheet away.

What was it on the lengthening shore
Her strained eyes sought in vain?
She stooped to turn the drying nets,
Then rose and gazed again.
"He waits behind the rock," she smiled,
"To greet his father fain."

Yet while she spoke, his boat to land
Along the fisher drew;
The breaking tide-wave's flashing crest
Cut white across the blue,
And a brimless hat beside his feet
The mocking waters threw.

A SCHUBERT CATALOGUE.*

(From the "Musical Times.")

"Not unfrequently," says Carlyle, in the "Preliminary" of his Sartor Resartus, "the Germans have been blamed for an unprofitable diligence; as if they struck into devious courses where nothing was to be had but the toil of a rough journey: as if, forsaking the gold mines of finance, and that political slaughter of fat oxen whereby a man himself grows fat, they were apt to run goose-hunting into regions of bilberries and crowberries, and be swallowed up at last into remote peat bogs. . . . Surely the plain rule is, let each considerate person have his way and see what it will lead to. For not this man and that man, but all men make up mankind, and their united tasks the task of mankind. How often have we seen some such adventurous, and perhaps much censured wanderer light on some outlying, neglected, yet vitally momentous province, the hidden treasures of which he first discovered, and kept proclaiming till the general eye and effort where directed thither, and the conquest was completed; thereby, in these his seemingly so aimless rambles, planting new standards, founding new habitable colonies, in the immeasurable circumambient realms of Nothingness and Night." Thus (with a very moderate expenditure of capital letters) does the Sage of Chelsea vindicate Diogenes Teufelsdröck, J.U.D., &c., his researches into the philosophy of clothes, and his six bags of "miscellaneous paper-masses." Some such championship might have appeared necessary when another German began to burrow for the details required to make up the first Thematic Catalogue of a great composer's works, and patiently to hunt down all the Protean forms which the ingenuity of arrangers and transcribers had caused those works to assume. Was the game worth the candle? Who would buy the book? To what use could it be put commensurable with the trouble involved? So might lookers-on have queried, not without a touch of scorn; but the patient German worked on, and the result was that he founded a distinct and increasing class of musical literature, the value of which nobody questions. Every composer of eminence will soon have his Thematic Catalogue. Dr Ludwig von Köchel has achieved the good work for Mozart—how completely some of us are thankful to know; an anonymous writer has attended to Schumann; Weber has been thoroughly "done" by F. W. Jahns; and painstaking Herr Nottebohm has looked after Beethoven. Nor is this all that Herr Nottebohm has accomplished in the same line; the firm of Friedrich Schreiber, in Vienna, is now offering, as the latest result of his patience, a thoroughly good catalogue of Schubert. Together with every amateur who is interested in Schubert, we hail the new work with pleasure, and congratulate Herr Nottebohm upon the manner in which he has discharged a very difficult task. The great essentials of such a book are accuracy and completeness; and when it is remembered that these qualities have to appear in connection with hundreds of compositions (many scattered about in MS.), and thousands of editions, the high merit of success need not be demonstrated. With regard to the accuracy of the Catalogue, it is, of course, impossible to judge confidently as respects every detail, but we have tested the book in many ways, and it has passed the ordeal triumphantly. That there are no flaws in its completeness would be too much to assert. Herr Nottebohm, for example, leaves unnoticed the few bars of melody which are all that Schubert wrote of the Scherzo in the eighth (B minor) symphony. But, generally speaking, the book may be styled an exhaustive one; in proof whereof take the particulars furnished about Die Schöne Müllerin. Besides the details usual to thematic catalogues, Herr Nottebohm gives us the result of his labours in tracing those famous songs through all their (German) editions and forms, nearly three closely-printed pages being devoted to the editions alone. The arrangements fill five and a-half pages more, the character of the transcription being specified, and also the author, publisher, place of publication, and price. When a compiler shows industry such as this, we are disposed to trust him, and accept his work.

In arranging his materials, Herr Nottebohm did not attempt the impossible task of settling the order in which Schubert's works were written. Wherever the date of composition can be ascertained it is given, but the Opus number guides in making up the first section of the book. The compositions included in this section, which is devoted to those with an Opus number only, are 173, beginning with the "Erl King," and ending with six songs for voice and pianoforte. This opening and closing must strike everybody who examines the list as significant. Turning over page after page, we find little save song after song; and even when a break first occurs, it is made by a set of waltzes (Op. 9). At Op. 15 we come upon the fantasia for pianoforte in C major, after which songs and waltzes begin again, till Op. 26 introduces the music to Rosamunde. Presently chamber music makes its appearance, but the ratio of important works to comparative trifles is not greatly increased. How eloquent is this fact, especially when looked at in connection with Herr Nottebohm's third section, which catalogues the compositions without Opus number, published after the composer's death. Here we start with the ninth and eighth symphonies, going on with the quartetts in D minor and major, the pianoforte sonata in A minor, and those in C minor, A and B flat. After these come four masses, the cantata, Lazarus, and a host of works nearly equal in importance. Truly, Schubert's is a posthumous fame. A writer of songs and waltzes in life: in death he appears among the grandest of tone-poets. Pity him we must, for such a spirit as his, though he laboured on regardless of present renown, could have done no other than long after that recognition which is, next to its own self-consciousness, the sweetest reward of genius. But the moral to be drawn from Herr Nottebohm's Catalogue brings comfort after all. The good cannot be repressed. That which has in it a spark of the divine fire will some day kindle the admiration of the world.

The second section embraces the multitude of Lieder published by Diabelli under the title: Franz Schubert's nachgelassene musikaliche Dichtungen für Gesang und Pianaforte—in all fifty sets. But to many who avail themselves of this welcome volume, one of its most interesting divisions will be that which brings the whole of the master's compositions under the eye in orderly battalions. After reviewing page after page of orchestral, chamber, and concerted music of various kinds, we come finally upon the army of songs and vocal pieces, only to look down their ranks with a sense of utter bewilderment as we remember that the author of all these things died at thirty-one. The fecundity of Schubert was monstrous, and, in view of it, his early death seems the most natural of events. He, if ever man did, accomplished the work that was appointed him. For this let us be thankful, and not for this alone. The gratitude of amateurs who love Schubert is due to the plodding, unwearied industry of the German savant from whom the book before us has come. Herr Nottebohm could never be charged with "goose hunting," or with exploring "regions of bilberries and crowberries," but, to continue the words of Carlyle, he has lighted on an outlying and neglected province, the treasures of which are now common property. Schubert owes him much on that account. We owe him more.

VIENNA.—Gräfin Stella is the title of a new comic opera by Herr Anton Vogl, musical director of the Schottenstift, in this capital.

ST PETERSBURGH.—According to the accounts of the local press the success of Mad. Patti in Les Huguenots has been something unprecedented.

DRESDEN.—A public exhibition has been opened of sixty-five designs sent in by as many different competitors, for the drop-curtain at the new Theatre Royal.

MILAN.—Gustavo Wasa still figures now and then in the bills of the Scala, but will shortly disappear to make way for the amended edition of Sig. Ponchielli's opera, I Lituani. This will be followed at a short interval by the new ballet, Semiramide.—The Teatro Santa Radegonda is announced to open shortly for French comic opera. Among the works to be produced are A. Maillart's Dragons de Villars; A. Adam's Postillon de Longjumeau; Auber's Cheval de Bronze; Lecocq's Prés Saint-Gervais; the same composer's Bel Danois, and Bottesini's Vinciguerra.—Il Guarany, by Sig. Gomez, is now playing at the Teatro Carcano, and attracts good houses, owing to the way in which Signora Berini-Maini sustains the part of Cecilia. The other artists are not all that could be desired; nor did the band and chorus shine to particular advantage.

MAD. CHRISTINE NILSSON AT ROUEN.

This gifted lady has been singing lately in the above old Norman city with the success which everywhere attends her. The following extracts from local papers will convey an idea of the enthusiasm she excited. The Nouvelliste de Rouen says:—

"More fortunate than Paris, Rouen can boast of having heard, after an absence which appears very long to all, the marvellous Swedish vocalist. This privilege, of which Paris is with reason jealous, was something of which our dilettanti did not fail to take advantage, and yesterday's performance will figure conspicuously in the annals of our principal theatre. An hour before the rising of the curtain, the approaches wore an animated air. The crowd carried them by assault, while a string of carriages extended into the neighbouring streets. The house assumed a festive look, for an artist, the prelude to success. The boxes were resplendent with the freshest toilets, and from the pit to the gallery rose tier above tier of eager spectators. Some had to invade the orchestra and stage. This anxiety and this display of luxury, forming so happy a contrast to our usual indifference, was nothing more than an act of just homage due to its recipient.

"When Mad. Nilsson appeared, a flattering murmur ran through the house. The strange charm of her physiognomy and person—that indefinable something which distinguishes her—began, even before she opened her lips, to plead her cause with those who had not already been privileged to hear Patti's fair rival, and who, by the beauty of her voice and splendour of her talent, were soon convinced. She sang; and long before she had concluded, the audience gave full vent to their enthusiasm."

[Here follows a sketch of Mad. Nilsson's career down to her recent successes in England, America, and Russia—the substance of which need not be repeated in the Musical World.—ED.]

"It has been said that, while drawing largely on its revenues, her voice, overtaxed by so many fatiguing efforts, sometimes borrowed from its capital; luckily, nothing is less true. Christine Nilsson brings back to us intact the jewel she took with her; not a diamond is wanting in the casket. She has returned the accomplished singer with whom all Paris is acquainted, and never, in our opinion, did she exhibit more perfect talent; a style more pure, or ampler resources. The audience were speedily made aware of this by the air from La Traviata, 'recalls,' 'encores,' and 'bouquets' beginning at once to end only with the last of her pieces. We shall not attempt to describe the andante from Lucia, or the 'Swedish melodies' with which her performances terminated. Analysis must stop here, and applause must speak for itself. It is stated that, during a performance of Tartuffe or Le Misanthrope, one of the spectators did nothing but repeat in every possible tone: 'What a piece of good fortune!' A neighbour, whose patience was worn out by these frequent explosions, at last enquired the cause. 'Why,' replied the enthusiast, 'I am delighted that Molière wrote this, because, had he not done it, no one else could.' An analogous reflection suggested itself every time the Swedish songstress made her appearance."

Discoursing on the same theme, the Journal de Rouen observes:—

"Like the Opera, the Théâtre-des-Arts has had its gala performance. At eight o'clock, the house was full, chairs having even been placed in the orchestra and on the stage. Mad. Nilsson was the attraction, and her success was brilliant. She was enabled to see during yesterday's performance—her first on the French stage since the burning of the old Operahouse—that a provincial public were ready to endorse a Parisian renown. Mad. Nilsson displayed great amiability in yielding to the wishes of the audience, who encored two of her pieces: Gounod's 'Ave, Maria,' and 'Le Bal,' a Swedish melody. She sang, also, the air from La Traviata, and another Swedish melody, 'La Jeunesse.' After every piece, the entire house greeted her with repeated applause, and she was presented with two bouquets which seemed to afford her much pleasure. Mad. Nilsson did not—and we congratulate her on the fact—content herself with merely reciting the air from Lucia. She acted it, and showed that behind the singer is a genuine dramatic artist. With regard to the national melodies, Mad. Nilsson's singing was perfection itself, while her touching and plaintive effects of intonation in 'La Jeunesse,' and her joyous laugh in 'Le Bal,' won every heart, making the audience believe they understood the words. The public separated, happy in the enjoyment of an evening so well, though so quickly, spent. We conclude with a wish, the realization of which would be highly welcome here—viz., that Mad. Nilsson may consent to play Marguerite in Faust. We predict for her a phenomenal success."

LOUVAIN.—A series of Popular Concerts have been organized in this town.

"ASTOUNDING IMPUDENCE."

The following incisive remarks, àpropos of a matter connected with Mr Bache's recent concert, are taken from the Illustrated Sporting and Dramatic News of March 6th:—

"At this concert a striking illustration was given of the evil results which flow from these wild theories when carried into actual practice. Weber's Polonaise Brillante, Op. 72, is not only one of the most charming among pianoforte solos, but is one of the best-known works of the composer; and there are many persons now living who have heard him play it. Instead of playing it as written by Weber, Mr Bache chose to parade the arrogance and self-sufficiency of Liszt by playing the charming pianoforte solo, as 'arranged for pianoforte and orchestra (!) by Franz Liszt.' The 'arranger' could not entirely hide the original beauty of the work; but, in the true spirit of self-assertion which characterizes the modern German school, he has directed the attention of the listeners from Weber to himself, by accompanying the solo with orchestration of an eccentric and often vulgar kind, which effectually prevents the bestowal of due attention on the charming work of Weber. Not satisfied with this, he has taken the slow movement from Weber's E flat Polonaise, and joined it bodily to the No. 72—as an opening movement! Had a composer of the highest genius ventured to take such a liberty with Weber, we should have protested against it; but when it is the pianoforte-player Liszt who rushes in where angels would fear to tread, we feel that the able writer of an article in the Daily Telegraph was quite justified in characterizing such attempts as exhibitions of 'astounding impudence.' This expression appears to have disturbed Mr Bache's digestion ever since it appeared, in November last, àpropos of his first performance of the Polonaise—as deranged by Liszt; and he has been so ill-advised as to print—in the programme book of his concert—what he probably considers a crushing rejoinder. He says that Mozart 'wrote accompaniments of an utterly un-Handelian character to "The people that walked in darkness;"' and that Mendelssohn and Schumann 'provide with a pianoforte accompaniment pieces which Bach had expressly intended for the violin solo.' Now Mr Bache must know that Handel's orchestral scores do not represent all the notes that were played when Handel's oratorios were performed under the composer's own direction. The orchestral players executed the notes which are still preserved, but a large amount of filling-in was done by the organ; and Mozart has but written down for the orchestra what seemed to him likely to be the notes which Handel would have supplied by means of the organ. He may have failed to catch the style of Handel, but he did his work in an earnest and reverent spirit. Had he 'arranged' Handel à la Liszt—had he taken the tenor air, 'Total Eclipse,' from Samson, and made of it a slow opening movement to the soprano air, 'Rejoice greatly,' in the Messiah, encumbering the monstrous hybrid with vocal accompaniments for a double choir—there might have been some analogy between his working and that of Liszt. Mozart, however, contented himself with trying to restore the original decorations of a structure whose form he would not have ventured to alter; and, fortunately, was spared the pain of forseeing that his endeavours would be denounced as 'un-Handelian' by Mr Walter Bache. Mendelssohn and Schumann did well to write pianoforte accompaniments to Bach's violin solos. They knew that the grand old Leipsic cantor improvised clavier accompaniments when these solos were played, and that neither he nor any of his sons would have thought of writing down those accompaniments for the benefit of the feebler musicians whose case was met by Mendelssohn and Schumann. Had they taken Bach's 'Bourrée in A minor,' joined it on to a fugue in his 'Well-tempered Clavier,' and accompanied the pianoforte with orchestration of their own devising, there would have been some analogy between their working and that of Liszt. After all, it is too ridiculous to speak of Mozart and Mendelssohn in the same breath with Liszt. * * * * When Mozart and Mendelssohn are brought up as witnesses, we are bound to sift the evidence; but the doings of respectable mediocrities are of little importance. It is weak to quote the petty naughtiness of such folk in justification of a wholesale mangling of Weber, which—despite Mr Bache's special pleading—appears to us to be justly stigmatised as 'astounding impudence.'"

DARMSTADT.—The receipts of Mad. Lucca's engagement at the Grand Ducal Theater amounted to 2,875 florins, of which sum 55 per cent. was the lady's share. According to report, Sig. Merelli has engaged Mad. Lucca to perform thirty times in three months, giving her 20,000 thalers, which he has deposited before-hand with a banker. As, however, his charge for her services will be 1000 thalers a night, he will, probably, not make a bad thing of the bargain.

(From a Correspondent.)

An attempt has been made to galvanize La Perle du Brésil at the Théâtre Royal de la Monnaie, by substituting M. Dauphin for M. Jules Petit in the character of the Admiral. The success achieved has not, however, been great. M. Dauphin sings very well, but he does not appear to advantage as an actor, and his figure is decidedly against him. He is better suited for the concert-room than the stage. Another new-comer has been Mdlle Marion, from Gand, who has sustained the part of Valentine in Les Huguenots. As a vocalist she was triumphant, but, as regards histrionic talent, she is not much superior to M. Dauphin. Hamlet will be produced almost immediately with Mdlle Priola in the character of Ophelia, which she will cede to Mad. Christine Nilsson, when that lady arrives, somewhere about the end of the month. Then M. Campocasso promises his patrons Haydée, Fra Diavolo, La Dame Blanche, and L'Eclair—with M. Achard; Le Nozze di Figaro, and La Reine de Chypre. The last named opera will be nearly equivalent to a novelty, not having been performed in this capital for upwards of ten years. The Municipality have ordered no less than five new scenes, three of them painted by leading artists in Paris.

The attractions at the other principal theatres consist, for the moment, of Les Prés Saint-Gervais, Le Tour du Monde, and La Maitresse légitime.

M. Davidoff, the Russian violoncellist, took part in a recent concert at the Cercle Artistique et Littéraire, the pieces he selected for performance being Beethoven's Sonata in A, Mendelssohn's Sonata in D, Linder's "Tarantelle," and two bagatelles of his own composition—"Adieu," and "La Source." Mad. Devaux was the pianist in the Sonatas. The vocalist was Miss May Moss, a young lady of New Orleans, who has studied at Dusseldorf and Cologne, her master being Ferdinand Hiller. She sang "Schön Blumlein," by Reinecke; a Romance by Mendelssohn; "Le Jardin," by Reber, and "Ogni Sabato," by Gordigiani. Her voice cannot boast of extraordinary volume, but it is of agreeable quality.

The members of the Flemish Club, Kunstgenootschap, lately got up an entertainment at the Lucas-Huys, in the Rue Ducale, "ter verherlijking van wiglen Willem de Mol," in honour of the late Willem de Mol, a Flemish composer, prematurely lost to art. M. J. Hoste, editor of the Zweep, referred to the early termination of the young artist's career; M. Antheums recited a Flemish poem in his praise; the Artisans-Réunis sang a chorus, and M. Blauwaert three melodies, both from his pen. Mdlle Staps and M. Alex. Cornelis were applauded in Raff's first sonata for Piano and Violin, and Vieuxtemps' Polish Variations.—Z.

MUSIC AT BERLIN.

(From our Correspondent.)

The Italian Opera Company, formerly under the management of Sig. Smecchia, but now acknowledging that of Mad. Artôt, have introduced to this capital Flotow's comic opera, L'Ombra. The experiment was not eminently successful; and the composer would be justified in exclaiming against the manner in which his work was represented. Mad. Artôt sustained the part of Gina; but the other performers, Sig. de Padilla (Dr Mirouet) excepted, were by no means satisfactory.

Mad. Mallinger has been re-engaged at the Royal Opera for three years. In order to enable her to fulfil some of the engagements contracted with other theatres when negociations with Herr von Hülsen had been temporarily broken off, she will be granted extra leave of absence for six weeks in the winter. Herr von Strautz, of the Leipsic Stadttheater, succeeds Herr Ernst as stage-manager on the 1st April, when Herr Ernst retires to assume the management of the Stadttheater, Cologne.

Among recent concerts may be mentioned the second and third of M. Anton Rubinstein, who, disdaining "extraneous helps," played solos by Bach, Haydn, Handel, Mozart, Beethoven, Schubert, Weber, Mendelssohn, Schumann, Chopin, and others. A young lady, Mdlle Ida Bloch, has produced a favourable impression as a pianist.

Prof. Stern, having recovered from his illness, resumes his post as conductor of the Symphonic Concerts in the Reichshalle.—Q.

THE CAMBRIDGE MUSICAL CHAIR.

The following circular has been sent to the electors by the secretaries of Mr Macfarren's committee:—

Cambridge, March 2, 1875.

My Dear Sir,—Permit us to call your attention to the accompanying address and the list of the Committee formed for the purpose of securing the election of Mr Macfarren to the vacant Musical Professorship. Mr Macfarren's eminence as a composer is probably known to you, but it is mainly on account of his qualifications as an instructor and lecturer that we venture to urge his claims upon your notice. Mr Macfarren has been for a long time connected with the Royal Academy of Music as Professor of Harmony and Composition, and has recently been elected its Principal. He has also been a Lecturer at the Royal Institution. No other English musician has such a reputation for sound scientific knowledge of the art, and for power of imparting it to others: and it is the desire to find in our Chair of Music an extended field for the exercise of his powers in this respect that has led Mr Macfarren to seek the honour of the appointment. Mr Macfarren's position in the musical world, both as regards seniority and attainments, is such as to render it unnecessary, we would hope, as well as difficult for him to produce testimonials on this occasion; and on this account we have taken the liberty of bringing the above facts under your notice.

Thomas Percy Hudson, R. Pendlebury,
Gerard F. Cobb, Arthur Beard,
Louis Borissow, A. W. Spratt.

To the Members of the Senate of the University of Cambridge.

Gentlemen,—The Professorship of Music in your University having become vacant by the lamented death of Sir Sterndale Bennett, I beg to offer myself as a candidate for the office.

In the event of your conferring upon me the great honour of appointing me your Professor, I should regard the office not only as an honour but also as a trust, and would endeavour to the best of my power to advance the study of music in the University. I should hope to do this not only by fulfilling the office of examiner for musical degrees, but by delivering lectures such as I hope might prove useful to resident musical students. I have the honour to remain, Gentlemen, yours faithfully,

George Alexander Macfarren,
Principal of the Royal Academy of Music.

The following Members of the Senate form Mr Macfarren's Committee:—

The Provost of King's, the Master of Trinity, the Master of St John's, the Master of St Peter's, the Master of Clare, the Master of Pembroke, the President of Queen's, the Master of St Catharine's, the Master of Christ's, the Master of Magdalene, the Master of Sidney Sussex, the Public Orator, the Registrary, Professors Clark, Hughes, Adams, Fawcett, Cayley, Mayor, Colvin, the Senior Proctor, the Junior Proctor, O. The Musical World,
LONDON, SATURDAY, MARCH 13, 1875.

MR GYE has issued his prospectus of the coming season, which will begin on Easter Tuesday, with a performance of Guillaume Tell—a good beginning, as far as choice of opera goes, and a vast improvement upon the Trovatore and Traviata of a few years back. The document will strike every one as almost stern in its business simplicity. No commercial "report" could be less marked by gush. Nothing, save the orchestra, has a word of praise; and even the prime donne are passed with a simple mention of their names. This is as it should be, for two reasons: first, because only thus can the operatic prospectus redeem its character; and next, because the public do not want to be told through its means who and what they are to admire. Familiar operas and well-known artists have had their merits appraised already; while with regard to new works and débutants, the proof of the pudding is in the eating, and not in the words of those who have interests at stake. We commend the reticence of Mr Gye's announcement, therefore, and hope it may be accepted as a model for all future time.

The manager, it will be observed, has not added many fresh names to his list of artists. Nor, on the other hand, has he taken any away from last season's roll. In point of fact it may be said that, substantially, the troupe of 1875 is that of 1874. How much this statement involves need scarcely be pointed out. It means Patti, Albani, Vilda, Marimon, D'Angeri, Sinico, Scalchi, Nicolini, Bolis, Bettini, Graziani, Maurel, Cotogni, Faure, Bagagiolo, Capponi, Ciampi—not a bad company, we believe, and one that many a subventioned manager would give his eyes to possess. The season might run its course very well with such a band of artists, but, as the public look for some new faces, Mr Gye promises five débutants, respecting whom nothing is said and nothing known. The chief of them, indeed, Mdlle Thalberg, has never yet appeared on any stage, but comes to us, so to speak out of the dark. It is not, the fault of this young lady that much is expected of her. She cannot help being the child of her parents, but, nevertheless, their reputation will be present to the minds of the audience when she appears; and in proportion will they raise their hopes. Report goes that Mdlle Thalberg possesses the requisites of eminence in her profession. This, we trust, will prove to be the case, for the sake of the name she bears, as much as for that of the theatre which will run the risk of her début. The remaining new comers—Mdlle Proch, Signor De Sanctis, Herr Seideman, and Signor Tamagno—arouse no feeling of any sort. They will be patiently waited for, and, no doubt, received with the coldness shown by a Covent Garden audience towards all absolutely unknown people.

In other respects, the personnel of the establishment remains unchanged. Signor Vianesi and Signor Bevignani continue at their post as joint-conductors; Mdlle Girod will be again the principal dancer, in association with two strangers, Mdlle Ricci and Travelli; Mr Carrodus "leads" the orchestra, Mr Betjemann the ballet; Mr Pittman is again organist; Signor Corsi superintends the chorus, and M. Desplaces acts as stage-manager. With regard to the chorus and orchestra, Mr Gye bids us look for considerable augmentation on particular occasions, which means, it is to be presumed, when Herr Richard Wagner dominates the scene. Otherwise, these important bodies will be in numbers as in excellence, what they have been in seasons past. It must be granted that Mr Gye has done well to keep his "old guard" about him. They have done their devoir in by-gone campaigns, and nobody who owns a sword of proof lightly throws it away for a new weapon, however the virgin steel may glitter.

Turning to the repertoire of the season we find a list of four operas, concerning which it is said that at least three will be produced. Two of the four are revivals: Gounod's

Romeo et Juliette being promised after a retirement of seven years; and Semiramide after a much longer withdrawal. Rossini's opera is often played at the other house, and, therefore, will hardly excite curiosity, even with Mdme Vilda as the Queen, and M. Faure as Assur. The case is different with regard to Romeo et Juliette. We have, it is true, no longer a Mario to look and act the lover in perfection; but Nicolini is a good substitute as times go, and Patti remains, a better Juliette, if possible, than ever. For other reasons it is well that Mr Gye has succeeded in removing the obstacles to our further acquaintance with an important, and, in some respects, very interesting work. Herold's Le Prés aux Clercs is the third opera promised, but we fear that our chances of hearing it are not great. Mr Gye announces no cast, neither does he say to whom the labour of adapting the opera for an Italian stage has been entrusted. This disappointment, however, can be borne, provided the promise of Wagner's Lohengrin be faithfuly carried out. Hardly, we imagine, would any manager venture now to trifle with the public curiosity about Wagner's operas. Time was when only a few cared for them, the rest being content to remain in ignorance. But now amateurs are in earnest, and indisposed to put up with further disappointment.

Mr Gye, we feel sure, will do what he has said he will; and the event of the season, the talk of the season, we may, perhaps, add the success of the season, cannot fail to be Lohengrin. In the cast we find the names of Albani, D'Angeri, Proch, Maurel, Bagagiolo, and Nicolini; and as scenery and decorations will, doubtless, prove worthy of the Royal Italian Opera, we may expect a performance of merit such as the composer himself would applaud.

—o—

RICHARD WAGNER issues a ukase, addressed to all the artists who have volunteered, or been requested, to take part in the grand-national-stage-play performances at Bayreuth. From this document we learn that:—The first week of July, 1875, will be devoted to pianoforte rehearsals of Rheingold; the second, to ditto of Die Walküre; the third, to ditto of Siegfried; the fourth, to ditto of the Götterdämmerung. From the 1st to the 15th of August, rehearsals will be given with full orchestra, the third week being devoted to the more difficult stage business. June and July, 1876, are selected for general rehearsals. The first public performance will come off early in August, 1876, in the following order:—Sunday, the 4th, at 7 o'clock, p.m., the beginning of Rheingold; Monday, 4 p.m., first act of Die Walküre; 6 p.m., second act; and 8 p.m., third act. The intervals will be passed by the audience in grounds contiguous to the theatre, and by the performers in a garden specially set apart. Siegfried will commence at 4 p.m., Tuesday, and Die Götterdämmerung, at 4 p.m., Wednesday. The performances will be repeated, in the same order, for the first time in the second week of August, and for the second in the third week. After thus unfolding his plans, Wagner states that nothing but "unconditional willingness" on the part of artists can enable him to accomplish his task successfully. He demands binding promises of co-operation, and lays stress upon the fact that "circumstances" (pecuniary circumstances?) are sufficiently flourishing to obviate the necessity of any artist stopping away on account of "material difficulties."

BY retiring from his candidature for the Cambridge Professorship in favour of Mr Macfarren, a graceful act, which those most interested will assuredly remember to his credit at a future time, has been done by Mr Barnby. Here are the terms in which the withdrawal was made:—

"To the Members of the Senate of the University of Cambridge.

"GENTLEMEN,—The long list of influential names forming Mr Macfarren's Committee appears to me to indicate a desire on the part of the Senate for that gentleman's success little short of unanimous.

"In deference to that implied desire, I beg leave to withdraw my name from the list of candidates.

"Whilst thanking those gentlemen who have interested themselves on my behalf, permit me to add that should the promise of Mr Macfarren's election be realized, the result will be scarcely less gratifying to me than would have been my own success.—Faithfully yours, "J. BARNBY."

This address speaks for itself, and hardly can a word of comment be necessary. Mr Barnby had a perfect right to come forward, but his frank acknowledgment of Mr Macfarren's claims, and his hearty good wishes for their recognition will raise him higher in general esteem than even his election could have done.

—o—

MR EBENEZER PROUT has resigned the editorship of the Monthly Musical Record, as, after what had occurred, he could no longer retain the position—a position both of trust and responsibility—with credit to himself. We cannot but applaud his decision, however we may regret the circumstances that led to it.

IN MEMORIAM.

Science from Lyell's crowns for Bennett spares.

Art that serves Beauty, Science that serves Truth,
Are kindred maids of mistresses akin.
This frail musician, whose creative youth
Pointed to heights he did not live to win,

And this unhasting and unresting sage,
Whose eye in lowly reverence read the ground,
Alike in Music's chords, and Earth's scored page,
Record of the Creator sought and found.

'Tis well that they should sleep here, side by side,
Among their fellows of the glorious choir—
By Purcell, he, and Handel, who with pride
May welcome this last master of the lyre:

By Woodward, he, and Hunter, and by him
The highest, humblest seeker of them all,
Newton—for to such race of Anakim
He brings not strength unmeet or stature small.

Sleep sweetly, modest master of sweet sounds,
Grey reader of the rocks and seas and sands—
While the great spheres make music in their rounds,
And earth's change broadens on through times and lands.

Punch.

MR AND MRS GERMAN REED continue to enjoy an uninterrupted success, fairly earned by the admirable manner in which their entertainment has been placed before the public, and the very great merit displayed in its representation by the compact little company at St George's Hall. We hear that the management intends to produce several novelties, the earliest of which will be a piece from the pen of Mr F. C. Burnand, entitled "Old China." The music is by J. L. Molloy. Mr W. S. Gilbert is also preparing a new entertainment, which will be produced this season. As "The Ancient Britons" has but a short time to run, two performances will be given on Easter Monday next, to meet the wishes of the patrons of the entertainment.

STERNDALE BENNETT COMMEMORATION AT THE CRYSTAL PALACE.

The promised tribute to the late Sir Sterndale Bennett was paid in due form on Saturday afternoon, when the selection consisted of twelve numbers exclusively chosen from his works. The programme, which could hardly have been made out with better judgment, exhibited the genius of the English musician under varied and always attractive phases. The concert began with the overture entitled Die Waldnymphe, first given at the Leipsic Gewandhaus in January, 1839, and ended with the "Fantaisie-Overture," Paradise and the Peri, composed in 1862 for the Jubilee of the Philharmonic Society. In each of these, though an interval of nearly a quarter of a century divides one from the other, the bright fancy, melodious flow, and highly-finished workmanship, rarely absent from Bennett's music, show that they belong to one and the same family. This, however, has long been recognized by the music-loving public, and it is sufficient to add that we have never heard either overture more admirably executed than on the present occasion, under the direction of Mr Manns. In the overture, Parisina, upon which, for manifest reasons, was conferred the place of honour, the conductor of the Crystal Palace orchestra had a more difficult task before him—a task, however, which he accomplished with equal success. The Waldnymphe and Paradise and the Peri had already on several occasions been introduced at the Sydenham concerts, but Parisina must have been strange, not only to Mr Manns, but to the large majority of his orchestra. Its last two public performances were at a concert of the Philharmonic Society, in May, 1848, and at one organized by the composer himself, in the Hanover Square Rooms, about a month later. Since then, notwithstanding the high opinion entertained of it by connoisseurs, Parisina has been allowed to lie quietly on the shelf. Its production just now was welcome, both to those who had formerly made acquaintance with it and those who came to judge it for the first time. In both instances the result was satisfactory; for some there was the revival of an old pleasure, for others—by far the greater number—the creation of a new one. Every pains had been taken to afford the long-neglected overture a fair chance of appreciation; and the effect was commensurate with the means employed to obtain it. A performance, more remarkable for spirit, clearness of detail, and the nicest observance of light and shade could not have been desired. That Parisina will henceforth resume a conspicuous place among the most admired of Bennett's compositions, may be taken for granted. Nothing could be more genuine than the reception awarded to it by the audience of Saturday. Another important instrumental work was the Concerto in C minor (No. 3), for pianoforte, with orchestral accompaniments, the solo part in which (among the most difficult of its class) was entrusted to Miss Agnes Zimmermann, a distinguished student in the institution of which the author was Principal, and a pianist fully equal to the undertaking. About so comparatively familiar a work, the high merit of which is unanimously admitted, it would be superfluous to say anything. Enough that the performance, whether of soloist or orchestra, gave little, if any, room for criticism. Miss Zimmermann was called for and applauded, as she amply deserved, and, later in the concert, played with elastic touch and delicate refinement the Rondo Piacevole (1842), one of the most individual and characteristic of its author's "fugitive" efforts, which Dr Hans von Bülow not long ago included in the programme of a "Recital."

The vocal music that enriched the selection comprised an interesting and happily contrasted series of pieces. "God is a spirit," the unaccompanied quartet from the Woman of Samaria, was allotted to four Academy students, Misses Jessie Jones and Thekla Fischer, Messrs H. Guy and Wadmore, who also contributed two part-songs, "Sweet Stream" and "Come, live with me," in each instance acquitting themselves well—so well, indeed, that with a persistence too emphatic to be ignored, the audience insisted upon hearing the quartet once again. A trio, "The hawthorn in the glade," and the tenor recitative and air, "O meadow clad in early green," comprised all that from the May Queen could be accommodated with a place in the programme. The former was assigned to Miss Jessie Jones, Messrs Guy and Wadmore, the latter to Mr Vernon Rigby, to whose share also fell the plaintive ditty, "Chloe in sickness" (Burns). No less than three songs—"The Better Land" (Mrs Hemans), "Castle Gordon," which might reasonably pass muster as a genuine Scotch melody, and "Gentle Zephyr" (Burns)—had for interpreter Miss Antoinette Sterling, who in the first of the three produced a marked impression. All the vocalists, however, did their best. It should be added that the concert was unexpectedly preceded by a short orchestral Elegy on the death of Sir Sterndale Bennett—a spontaneous contribution on the part of Mr T. Wingham, one of the most favoured pupils of the late master. The Elegy, near the conclusion of which an allusion to the barcarolle in the fourth concerto is gracefully brought in, has all the sentiment appropriate to such an offering, and was listened to with an interest not to be misconstrued.

For the next concert,* Mendelssohn's Reformation symphony is announced, as well as Schumann's overture to Genoveva; that of Mr W. G. Cusins to the Travailleurs de la Mer, and last, not least, a new concerto (in G) from the pen of Herr Joseph Joachim, the principal part in which will be played by the famous violinist himself.—Times.

Mdlle Marie Krebs' second recital at St James's Hall, on Wednesday afternoon, was as brilliant and successful as her first—a week previous. We reserve remarks on both.

British Orchestral Society.—The first concert of the third season of this newly-formed society, was held at St James's Hall, on Wednesday evening, under the direction of Mr Mount. The entire programme, vocal and instrumental, was selected from the works of the late Sir Sterndale Bennett. The concert was a decided success. More in our next.

St Patrick's Eve will be celebrated at the Royal Albert Hall by an Irish Festival concert, in which Madame Lemmens-Sherrington, Madame Patey, Mr Vernon Rigby, and Signor Foli (who will sing in London for the first time this season), are to take part. Mr Levy, the celebrated cornet player, also appears, and Part Songs will be contributed by the Part-Song Choir of the Royal Albert Hall Choral Society.

Sacred Harmonic Society.—Mendelssohn's St Paul will be performed by the Sacred Harmonic Society, at Exeter Hall, on Friday next, the 19th inst. Miss Edith Wynne, Madame Patey, Mr Edward Lloyd, and Mr Santley, are to be the principal vocalists. Sir Michael Costa will conduct the performance. The usual Passion week (43rd) performance of the Messiah takes place on Wednesday, the 24th inst.

Mr Willem Coenen gave his second performance of Modern German Chamber Music on Thursday night, at St George's Hall. The selection of pieces was quite as varied and interesting as at the first, a week since, and Mr Coenen's coadjutors were the same eminent artists mentioned last week, viz., Messrs Wiener, Amor, Zerbini, and Daubert, with the addition, in a very interesting ottet by Svendsen, of MM. Vogel, Jung, Stehling and Ould. The vocalists on this occasion were Misses Anna Williams and Julia Elton. We shall return to these concerts—the third of which is announced for next Thursday—very shortly.

If.

Had I been king of Cariboo—
I might have been, and so might you—
I ne'er had lent
My full consent
To calling chalk a condiment.

To wean the nation from such themes
I might have shown them passing gleams
Of anchorites,
And trilobites,
And other entertaining sights.

But since this simple sort of thing
Occurs not to the reigning king;
The Cariboos
Do what they choose,
And hold on chalk eccentric views.

But they can't prove, howe'er they talk,
That pepper is the same as chalk.
Such heresy
Would not suit me
And hanged each mother's son should be.

Fun.

From ("Another World.")

"Improve Nature's gifts, and with her elements form new compounds . . . .
"Were man's faculties given that they should slumber?"

One night in my slumber I was disturbed by my attendant telling me that the gardener had an important communication to make. I bade him enter. He came to make known to me that my labours had been so far successful that, in the vase of earth in which the seed had been planted, a little white bud was bursting from the ground. He brought the vase in his arms, and I will not deny that I shed tears of joy.

About three years from that time, to my delight, fruit made its appearance. I watched with greedy eagerness the day when it would ripen.

I cannot tell you with what anxiety I tended its growth. I fancy at this moment I feel the heart-beatings that always accompanied me as I approached the spot where the plant was placed.

The gardener, desiring to save me some of the pain of deferred hope, told me that the time of ripening would be later than I had anticipated.

A little in advance, however, of the time I had foretold, the gardener entered my study with a face radiant with joy, and placed before me one of the prettiest little baskets I had ever seen, though the beauty of our basket-work is, as I have said, remarkable. I thought it must be a present from his wife, for she was very skilful and often presented me with baskets of her own work. Loving my people as I did and looking on them all as my children, I saw the nervous state of the man, and to reassure him, I said, "This is kind of your fair Lineena." At the same time I admiringly examined the basket, but its weight indicating that there was something inside, I raised the lid, and beholding its contents I uttered a cry, such a cry of joy as might escape a parent on finding a long-lost child.

The basket contained a specimen of the precious fruit, quite ripe. I turned it on every side with anxious interest, and, having congratulated my faithful gardener, who had so zealously carried out my wishes, I descended to the culinary department, for I would not trust the precious treasure to others, and I immediately proceeded to cook the vegetable of my creation.

I directed a small bird to be prepared with which to eat the new condiment, that I might thus test its properties; when it had been served, I directed the gardener to sit at my table. The success was beyond my best hopes. By the process of cooking, the fruit-vegetable had been dissolved to the consistency of a jelly, and formed the most relishing sauce ever tasted,—aromatic, stimulating, and appetising.

To a richness like cream was added the pungency and aromatic flavour of spices, with the relish of salt and the piquancy of fresh lemon-juice—in a word, the combination presented the finest flavour for a condiment that could possibly be desired, surpassing all the spices and sauces hitherto known in my world. Indeed, it was so exquisitely appetising that an epicure might easily be tempted to eat the vegetable without the addition of meat.

During the growth of the tree, many slips had been planted, which were then in a flourishing state, so that in a very short time the vegetable-fruit was cultivated extensively, and became a household necessity.

OCCASIONAL NOTES.

The late Sir Sterndale Bennett.—An influential meeting was held, on Monday, at Sheffield, the native town of Sir Sterndale Bennett, to consider the question of erecting a monument to him. The meeting was held in the rooms of the School of Art, and was called by Mr W. Smith, President of the Local Chamber of Commerce. It was decided that the monument should take the form of a bust, to be placed, with a suitable inscription, in the Cutlers' Hall. The cost will be about 200 guineas, much of which has already been subscribed.

A monument to Aimée Desclée, the celebrated actress, will be inaugurated on Tuesday at Père-la-Chaise. The monument is a small pyramid of Burgundy-stone, bearing on one side the words, Frou-Frou, Marcéline, La Visite des Noces, La Princesse Georges, La Gueule de Loup, La Femme de Claude, and on the other the inscription, "Aimée Desclée, 18 November, 1836, 9 Mars, 1874" —being the dates of her birth and death.

The Cambridge University Professorship.—We are authorized to state that Dr Chipp has renewed his candidature for the Musical Professorship in Cambridge University, he having retired only on the assurance that Mr Macfarren would be unopposed.

Sir Hope Grant.—In a very interesting review of the military career and exploits of this great general, which appeared in Monday's Times, there is a passing remark that cannot fail to interest musicians and amateurs of music:—

"In the midst of the hardest marching, alternately with constant fighting and alarms of war, his violoncello was sure to figure in his scanty baggage."

Herr Carl Behrens has been taking very successfully to the singing of oratorio music in the provinces. Recently at the Liverpool Philharmonic he sang the principal bass music in the Messiah, and shortly afterwards that of Judas Maccabæus at a sacred concert in Edinburgh. In both instances he seems to have given very general satisfaction, and his performances were spoken of in high terms by the local connoisseurs.

The Intendant-General, Herr von Hülsen, has posted up bills in the Theatres Royal, Berlin, begging ladies to attend the performances without bonnets, and to modify the capillary structures with which they are accustomed to adorn, or disfigure, themselves. Such head-dresses prevent people occupying back seats from obtaining even a tolerable view of the stage. Unless Herr von Hülsen is prepared to follow up his appeal by the practical use of cold steel (like Peter the Great on the beards of his Boyards), he is hardly destined to witness any abatement of the nuisance to which he calls attention.

CONCERT.

M. Alexandre Billet gave his third and last recital on Wednesday morning at St George's Hall. The accomplished Franco-Russian pianist was in "full force." Opening his recital with Weber's Trio in G minor (Op. 63) for pianoforte, flute, and violoncello, in which he was ably assisted by Messrs J. Radcliff and Paque, he next favoured his audience with Beethoven's Sonata in A flat (by desire), which, notwithstanding the contretemps of the pianoforte getting out of order, and thus interrupting the performance for a time, went well, and was loudly applauded. M. Billet also gave a selection of pieces by Chopin, Moscheles, Brahms, and Rubinstein, in all of which he maintained his position as a pianist of the first rank. With his talented pupil, Miss Constance Levy, M. Billet played Moscheles' Sonata in E flat (Op. 47), a work we should like to hear oftener. Miss Levy proved herself a worthy associate of her master, playing in a clear and earnest manner and showing unmistakably the excellent instruction she has received, and the profitable use she had made of it. The duet was loudly and deservedly applauded. Mdme Ernst sang Meyerbeer's aria, "Va dit elle," and a song by Pinsuti; M. Paque, the excellent violoncellist, played, in his very best style, a "Larghetto and Rondo," by Boccherini. Messrs. Ganz and Lehmeyer were the accompanists of the vocal music.

Athens.—The Politeama, now in course of erection here, will be opened in May with Italian opera.

Florence.—Sig. Auteri-Manzocchi's opera, Dolores, has achieved, as it were, succès d'estime at the Pergola.

Rome.—After singing once in Aida, Signora Stolz was compelled through illness, to cancel her engagement. She was replaced, at short notice, by Signora Wisjak.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

A "Students' Evening Concert," the first at St James's Hall, was given on Thursday evening, in honour of the late Principal, Sir W. Sterndale Bennett, from whose works the entire programme was selected, as will be seen below:—

Anthem (Op. 30, No. 1), "Remember now thy Creator (Solo parts, Miss Mary Davies, Welsh Choral Union scholar, and Miss Barkley)—W. Sterndale Bennett; Rondeau à la Polonaise, in C minor (Op. 37), pianoforte (Miss Borton)—W. Sterndale Bennett; Song (Op. 23, No. 4), "To Chloe in Sickness" (Miss Nessie Goode)—W. Sterndale Bennett; Chamber Trio, in A (Op. 26), for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello (Mr Walter Fitton, Mdlle Gabrielle Vaillant, and Mr Buels)—W. Sterndale Bennett; Recit., "Let thy mind," and Duet, "Do no evil" (Op. 30, No. 2), (Miss Agnes Larkcom, Westmorland Scholar, and Miss Grace Bolton)—W. Sterndale Bennett; Three Diversions, for two performers on the pianoforte, Op. 17 (Miss Martin and Miss Hancock)—W. Sterndale Bennett; Song (Op. 35, No. 3), "Dawn, gentle flower" (Miss Mary Davies, accompanied by Miss Mary Butterworth)—W. Sterndale Bennett; Anthem, "Now, my God, let, I beseech Thee" (composed for the occasion of the consecration of the Chapel of St John's College, Cambridge, May 12th, 1869, first time of performance in London) (solo parts, Miss Marie Duval, Miss Mary Davies, Miss Grace Bolton, Mr Fred. Nichols, and Mr George)—W. Sterndale Bennett; Three Musical Sketches, "The Lake," "The Millstream," and "The Fountain" (Op. 10) (pianoforte, Miss Alice Curtis, Potter Exhibitioner)—W. Sterndale Bennett; Duet (Op. 30, No. 3), "And who is he that will harm you" (Miss Jessie Jones and Miss Thekla Fischer)—W. Sterndale Bennett; Sonata in A flat (Op. 46), "The Maid of Orleans" (pianoforte), Andante Pastorale (In the Fields), Allegro Marziale (In the Field) (Miss Evans), and Adagio Patetico (In Prison), Semplice, Moto di Passione (The End) (Miss Boxell)—W. Sterndale Bennett; Song (Op. 35, No. 6), "Sing, Maiden, Sing" (Mr Henry Guy)—W. Sterndale Bennett; Impromptus in E and F sharp minor (Op. 12, Nos. 2 and 3) (pianoforte, Miss Combs)—W. Sterndale Bennett; Part-Songs, "Sweet stream, that winds through yonder glade," and "Come live with me"—W. Sterndale Bennett. Conductor, Mr Walter Macfarren; organist, Mr Walter Fitton; accompanist, Miss Alice Curtis.

The whole performance was satisfactory to the well-wishers of the Institution and to the students, who do it honour.

The next public rehearsal is announced to take place on Thursday morning, April 8th, under the direction of Mr Walter Macfarren, when the programme will be selected entirely from the works of the late Principal, and include the sacred cantata, The Woman of Samaria.

THERE IS NOTHING NEW UNDER THE SUN.

The latest example of the truth contained in this time-honoured saying is, if we are to believe a contributor to the Guide Musical of Brussels, afforded by the new National-Festival-Stage-Play-Theatre at Baireuth. The contributor in question boldly asserts that Grétry thought of something similar years ago, and that, therefore, the claims of Herr Wagner to originality of design.

"Are melted into air, into thin air."

Hear what he says:

"The papers are filled with details descriptive of the New Paris Operahouse. It is curious to contrast with this gigantic building, lately inaugurated, the modest edifice which Grétry desired to see raised to musical and dramatic art. 'Were I a manager, I should say to my architect: Recollect that what we here want is not a monument constructed solely to be looked at and to produce a grand effect on the eye; the essential point is that we may be able to hear perfectly all that is said upon the stage.'

"After developing this thesis, and banishing, by way of termination, 'the music of big notes,' whence orchestral 'finish' is excluded, 'to the large houses for musical tragedies,' the author of the Tableau parlant continues:

"'No boxes, small or big. I would have a circular house, all rising in steps; each place convenient and separated by slight lines of demarcation an inch high. After the orchestra for the musicians, a series of steps should form a single circular amphitheatre, gradually rising with nothing above it save a few trophies painted in fresco.' With regard to the orchestra he wished that 'it should be veiled from view and that neither the musicians nor the lights of their music-stands should be seen from the side of the audience. The effect would be magical, and we know that, in all cases, the orchestra is never supposed to be where it is. I think that a hard stone wall is needed to separate the orchestra from the stage, so that the sound may reverberate in the front of the house.'

"Who does not recognise in this theatre dreamed of by Grétry, the edifice now approaching completion at Baireuth? Leaving out of consideration the dimensions, we might fancy that Wagner has modelled his plan on that traced by our countryman. Not a single box. The rows of seats rise from the stage like the steps of an amphitheatre. No ornaments to divert the attention; a few columns at the sides of the house. No foot lights. The orchestra is rendered invisible, the musicians being placed five metres lower than the level of the stage. There is a space left completely empty; this is, as Wagner calls it, the mystic space, a sort of 'sonorous wall,' separating the Real (the public) from the Ideal (the stage).

"We spoke of a difference in the dimensions. Yet Wagner and Grétry are near agreeing on this point. The latter wanted only a thousand spectators. Wagner puts fifteen hundred persons in the pit and five hundred in the gallery above, which is exclusively reserved for the inhabitants of Baireuth. These two geniuses, as we perceive, have in view solely the ideal perfection of art. For them the essential objects are the stage and the orchestra. To be freed from everything calculated to divert the attention, to attain, so to speak, to the state of 'a dream,' to hear 'directly,' and not 'by re-percussion or in echoes,' such is what they desire above aught else. Asking himself what there could be in common between 'dreams and the productions of genius,' and answering the question by the profound phrase that: 'It is the man of night who does everything, the man of the morning is often but a mere scribe.' Grétry felt that, in order perfectly to enjoy productions thus brought to light, it was necessary that the imagination should, so to speak, be transported into the state of ecstacy, which gave birth to them. He thus relates one of his dreams.

"'The most delicious opera I ever heard in my life, and which was a thing not of my organs but of my mind, is one at which I was present in a dream. Never was I myself and never did I behold the spectators so sweetly entranced. It was not a tumultuous and fatiguing delirium, but a continuation of gentle sensations, without any monotony; there were none of the gigantic effects opposed to absolute repose; no too striking contrasts between the colours; the contrasts were those of the rainbow, and they depicted deliciously every situation of the drama. Everything we are told concerning the pleasure experienced by the souls of the Blessed in Elyseum was reproduced by this music. On awaking, I endeavoured to remember some touches of the melody, some of the harmony in this celestial production, but in vain. The moral man was already mixed up with the physical man. The sun was covered with an impenetrable cloud; all that was left me were regrets and the certainty of having enjoyed.'"

DONIZETTI AND SIMON MAYR.

Writing in La Perseveranza, Sig. Filippi says:—

"The people of Bergamo, with that patriotism which distingnishes them, intend honouring, next September, with an extraordinary solemnity the memory of two great masters, Gaetano Donizetti and Simon Mayr. Bergamo, justly proud of having been the birth-place of Donizetti, professes special veneration for Simon Mayr also. The latter, although German by birth, went, when still a boy, to Bergamo, which he made his adoptive country. He lived there all his life, and died there at the advanced age of eighty. A fertile and most excellent composer, especially of sacred works, he was the founder and the master of the Musical Institute of Bergamo. He educated and supplied with means many composers and celebrated artists who issued from that establishment. He was the master, the friend, and second father of Gaetano Donizetti, whose genius and whose glory soon eclipsed his preceptor's. The remains of Donizetti and those of Mayr have been lying for many years in private vaults in one of the city cemeteries. To preserve these venerated relics from the ravages of time, and keep them in a more fitting place, the Municipality caused them to be identified and put into appropriate copper coffins, which will be interred in the Monumental Basilica of Santa Maria Maggiore, and under the bases of the monuments erected inside the sacred edifice to the two great masters.

"Inspired by a noble thought, the citizens of Bergamo have resolved on transporting with extraordinary pomp the coffins to the cemetery of the Basilica, accompanying the act with a religious and with a civil festival, to which will be invited not only all the local composers and musicians, of whom there are a great number, including some highly distinguished ones, but also all foreign composers and musicians, who may be desirous of paying homage by their presence to the memory of Donizetti and of Mayr. Bergamo, we have no doubt, will do herself honour on this occasion, as she has done on others. She has already given us a pledge that she will do so by electing for the purpose from among her citizens a committee of distinguished persons, presided over by Commander G. B. Camozzi, Senator."

WAIFS.

We are informed, on creditable authority, that one of the chief attractions of the forthcoming season at Her Majesty's Opera, Drury Lane, will be the Bolognese version of Wagner's Lohengrin. The leading parts are assigned to Mdlle Tietjens (Ortrud), Madame Christine Nilsson (Elsa), and Signor Campanini (the original Italian "Knight of the Swan"). A more promising cast could hardly be desired.

Nicolini is said to be engaged for the Cairo opera, on splendid terms.

We are glad to learn that Mr Crowdie has resumed his position as Editor of the Musical Standard.

Pending the first performance of his comic opera, Carmen, M. Georges Bizet received the cross of the Legion of Honour.

Mr W. B. Healey is to be the acting manager for Mons. Rivière's series of promenade concerts, announced to commence at the Prince's Theatre, Manchester, on March 24th.

Mr F. Howell's oratorio, The Land of Promise, is to be performed at the Unitarian Church, Yarmouth, on Easter Sunday afternoon, as a "Service of Song," with orchestral accompaniments.

Mr Mapleson has engaged the celebrated Italian tragedian, Salvini, for a series of performances at Drury Lane Theatre, to commence on the first of April, with, as we are informed, Shakspere's Othello.

Verdi has declined an invitation to assist at the performance of Aïda, in Rome, on the ground that it would be necessary for him to take his seat in the Senate, and he does not wish the two events to be simultaneous.

The Salvator Rosa of Sig. Gomez has been produced at the Teatro Regio, Turin. The composer was called on 22 times. 220,000 times. —De Blinde. (After Il Guarany, it behoves Mr Gye to look sharply after Salvator Rosa.—D. P.)

Claude Jaquinot, a young violinist, fifteen years of age, though he bears a French name, was born and educated in England. Master Jaquinot lately gave a concert in Paris, assisted by MM. Roger, Bonnehée, Salomon, &c., with complete success, according to the 19me Siècle and other journals of repute.

The elaborate and thoughtful assessment of the position of Sir Sterndale Bennett in the ranks of musical composers, in the current number of Fraser's Magazine is, I hear, from the pen of Mr H. H. Statham, a gentleman who, while practising professionally as an architect, is intimately acquainted with music. Some of Mr Statham's remarks will probably excite animadversion, but by the friends of Bennett his article is voted discriminately and yet thoroughly just.—Liverpool Post.

Signor Arditi has left Berlin for Vienna, where he is engaged to conduct the Italian opera, with Madame Adelina Patti as the "star." At Berlin, Signor Arditi brought out M. de Flotow's L'Ombra, with Madame Artôt-Padilla and her husband in the principal characters. The opera was successful, and the Emperor and Empress were present. At a court concert, two of Signor Arditi's compositions were given "by command," and the Emperor and Empress personally expressed to Sig. Arditi the pleasure they had derived from hearing them.

Mr Ransford's Golden Wedding.—This day, the 13th of March, Mr Ransford, the popular vocalist and composer, will complete his seventieth year, while the 23rd is the fiftieth anniversary of his marriage—his Golden Wedding Day. The Lord Mayor, by whom the "veteran" is highly esteemed, has signified his intention of marking the occasion by giving a dinner at the Mansion House to Mr and Mrs Ransford, and thirty of their personal friends. This is not only a high compliment to Mr Ransford and his family, but indirectly to the musical profession.

Rose Hersee.—Of Miss Rose Hersee it would be little to say that she is the best of our English dramatic singers. She has no superior in the concert-room. On the stage, however, she stands quite alone; and judged, not by comparison with other English vocalists (of whom the best are to be heard only at concerts), but by the standard of such perfect singing as is sometimes to be heard on the Italian stage, Miss Hersee may claim to rank among the best of the so-called "light sopranos." Miss Rose Hersee is now to be heard at the Philharmonic Theatre Islington, where, to the surprise of every one, the ever-changing but apparently indestructible thing called "English opera" has just started into new existence. It may be doubted nevertheless, whether English opera can be kept up by one singer alone, even though that singer possesses the lightness and buoyancy which, with many other attractive qualities, belong to Miss Rose Hersee. Miss Hersee sings brilliantly and with good expression; she bears herself gracefully on the stage; and she is a lively and intelligent actress. Indeed, aided by a contralto, tenor, baritone, and bass of something like her own merit, and supported by a well-trained orchestra, she would be invaluable to any theatre whose manager was determined to give once more a fair trial to English opera.—Pall Mall Gazette.

The following extraordinary announcement appeared outside the Grand Opéra last week:—"Ce soir mercredi relâche, par indisposition de MM. Villaret, Salomon, Sylva, Léon Achard, Bosquin et Vergnet." Six tenors ill, all at once, and in one Theatre!!

In reference to the proposed Musicians' Window at Westminster Abbey, a correspondent has kindly furnished the Choir with a copy of a window of somewhat similar design which has been placed in Louth Church, by Messrs Clayton & Bell, as a memorial to the late Mrs Barnard, better known to the musical world as "Claribel." The window, which has five lights, represents the musical characters of the Bible, the subject of the first light being Miriam, with her timbrel; of the second, David, with a harp; of the third, the Virgin Mary, with a lily; of the fourth, Asaph (the leader of David's choir), with a stringed instrument; of the fifth, Deborah under a palm tree. The glass at the base is filled with designs corresponding to those above, and the window, as a whole, is said to be completely successful.

Bremen.—A new opera—Edda, by C. Rheinthaler—has been produced at the Stadttheater.

Palmero.—Sig. Ponchielli's Promessi Sposi has been given at the Teatro Bellini—with what success is left to conjecture. Only Mr Gye can fix the status of this opera.

Chemnitz.—Verdi's Aida has been brought out at the Stadttheater with complete success. The manager, Herr Sasse, has spared neither time nor money in putting it on the stage.

Prague (8th March).—Mr Charles Oberthür, the accomplished harpist, met with great success and had a flattering reception at the "Ctvrtého Koncertu" yesterday. His performance of Parish-Alvars' Concerto was greatly applauded, and he was unanimously recalled at its conclusion. After playing his own "Souvenir de Londres" he was recalled three times, and then played his "La Cascade," with the greatest success. The concert was one of the best attended for some time, and there were present the President of the Conservatoire (Count Waldstein) and his family; also, Prince Emil, of Fürstenberg, and the élite of the nobility of Prague. M. Jindricha Hofmanna's "Frithjof" Symphony, his "Overtura K Shakespeare-ovu Richardu III.," and "Modlitba" z Webrova (K. M. z.), "Kouzelého strelce" od Bedr. Luxa, made up the programme of the evening.

THE VOICE & SINGING

BY

ADOLFO FERRARI.

THE FORMATION AND CULTIVATION OF THE VOICE FOR SINGING.

Price 12s.

London: Duncan Davison & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

"The remarkable qualities of this book are the author's freedom from conventional trammels, the strong sense of his opinions, and the novelty yet evident soundness of his precepts; his work has consequently come into general use as a manual of vocal instruction."—Daily News.

DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE,

For invigorating and enriching the voice, and removing affections of the throat.

DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE is universally acknowledged to be the most valuable remedy for sore throat, hoarseness and relaxed throat. It should always be taken before singing or reciting, as it strengthens the vocal organs. It is most extensively prescribed by the faculty for the throat and voice. Dr Lewis of Basingstoke says he finds them most efficacious, and in Dr Copland's Dictionary of Practical Medicine (Longman & Co.), they are strongly recommended at pages 872 and 1492. They are used by all the greatest vocalists and orators in Europe, and have been established over a quarter of a century. Testimonials from Patti, Grisi, Lablache, Santley, &c. Sold in boxes, 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. by all Chemists throughout the United Kingdom and the Colonies.

ARTHUR SULLIVAN'S NEW SONG,
"THOU ART WEARY,"
WORDS BY ADELAIDE PROCTOR.
MUSIC BY ARTHUR SULLIVAN.
SUNG BY
MISS ANTOINETTE STERLING
AT THE
MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

"The singer was Miss Antoinette Sterling, who, always heartily admired in those German ballads, for which she exhibits so marked a sympathy, introduced in a group four of Schumann's most graceful contributions to the Lieder repertory, and, later in the evening, a new song by Mr Arthur Sullivan, 'Thou art weary' (set to words by Adelaide Proctor)—one of the most charming recent emanations from the pen of our gifted compatriot."—The Times, Nov. 10.

"Miss Sterling was the vocalist, and sang, in addition to selections from Schumann, a new song by Arthur Sullivan, entitled, 'Thou art weary,' which is one of the most beautiful and thoughtful effusions of the composer's graceful music."—Daily Telegraph, Nov. 12.

"Miss Antoinette Sterling was the vocalist. In the second part she introduced a new song by Mr Sullivan, an admirable setting for a contralto voice of some very touching lines by the late Miss Adelaide Proctor, addressed by a poor mother to her starving child, the burden being—

'Sleep, my darling, thou art weary;
God is good, but life is dreary.'

The song exactly suited Miss Sterling's voice and style, and it will assuredly become as great a favourite as 'Will he come,' to which it is a worthy pendant, and the words of which are also by Miss Proctor."—Standard, Nov. 12.

"Miss Antoinette Sterling repeated Mr Sullivan's new song, 'Thou art weary,' a second hearing of which has confirmed our good opinion of it."—Standard, Nov. 16.

"At the concert on Monday, Miss Sterling had introduced a series of charming Lieder by Schumann, and a new song by Mr Arthur Sullivan, 'Sleep, my darling, thou art weary,' an admirable setting of Miss Proctor's poem, 'Hush, I cannot bear to see thee,' which, like everything Miss Proctor wrote, was well adapted for, and, in fact, seemed to invite musical treatment. Her verses have inspired Mr Sullivan with a genuine melody, of which the refrain is particularly remarkable; and the song, both at Monday's and Saturday's concert, pleased so much that Miss Sterling was called upon to repeat it."—Pall Mall Gazette, Nov. 17.

"Miss Sterling sang discreetly and sympathetically four of Schumann's 'Dichterliebe' (Nos. 1, 2, 7, and 8); but came off still better in a new song by Mr A. Sullivan, who has set words by Adelaide Proctor, 'Thou art weary,' the dying consolation of a starved mother to her child, the refrain of which is—

'Sleep, my darling, thou art weary;
God is good, but life is dreary.'

It is a painful theme; but the composer has treated it with such pathos that the air tells powerfully."—Athenæum, Nov. 14.

"The vocalist was Miss Sterling, who sang four songs by Schumann (Nos. 1, 2, 7, and 8 of the 'Dichterliebe'), and a new song, entitled 'Thou art weary,' written by Miss Adelaide Proctor. The words are good, and have been fitted to charming and expressive music by Mr Arthur Sullivan, who has added a pianoforte accompaniment worthy his high reputation, and worth listening to for its own sake."—Observer, Nov. 15.

Published in the keys of D minor and F minor, Price 4s.

ARTHUR SULLIVAN'S NEW SONG,
"TENDER AND TRUE,"
SUNG BY
MISS EDITH WYNNE
AT THE
MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS, ST JAMES'S HALL.

"The vocalist was Miss Edith Wynne, who sang a new song, 'Tender and True,' by Arthur Sullivan, the beauty of which, aided by a most tasteful rendering, elicited an encore."—Daily Telegraph, January 13.

"Mr Sullivan's graceful song—a novelty—was rendered by Miss Edith Wynne with much refined expression; and the applause which followed necessitated its entire repetition."—Daily News, January 13.

"A very expressive new song, by Mr A. Sullivan, 'Tender and True,' was sung with such effect by Miss Edith Wynne that it had to be repeated."—Illustrated London News, January 16.

"Miss Edith Wynne, who gave, in her own genuine and expressive manner, a graceful new song, 'Tender and True,' by Mr Arthur Sullivan, which was encored, and repeated."—Graphic, January 16.

Published in the keys of E flat and F, Price 4s.

MUSICIANS WHO HAVE DIED AWAY.*

II.

ANTONIO SALIERI.

This is, perhaps, the place for an anecdote of Antonio's student-years, because it is characteristic of the period and of the persons concerned.

After Salieri was sufficiently conversant with score reading and the direction of large masses, Gassmann never conducted more than the first three performances of a new opera, ceding his place at the piano, for all subsequent ones, to his talented pupil. One evening (it was one of the first three performances), Salieri, instead of remaining according to Gassmann's order, in the pit, slipped away on to the stage, as he was bored by the exceedingly mediocre music. The carpenters were just engaged behind the scene-cloth in arranging a table for a banquet which was to take place in the following scene. They finished their task, but Antonio still lingered for the purpose of examining more closely the pasties and roast meats made of cleverly painted pasteboard. Suddenly the signal was given for a change; the scene-cloth was rolled upwards; and the curious youth had scarcely time to creep under the table, which was covered with a cloth reaching to the ground. He executed, however, this manœuvre with such rapidity that no one observed him. Immediately afterwards, the performers entered and seated themselves singing at the table. This was sufficiently long and broad for Salieri to remain concealed beneath it without touching those who were sitting down. As the act concluded with this scene, he hoped he should be able to glide unremarked from his hiding-place. But matters turned out quite otherwise. During the banquet, one of the singers dropped his napkin. As he stooped to pick it up, he became aware of something black, which he took for a large dog, behind the yielding cloth. During the next pause in the singing he communicated his discovery to his neighbour at table; the latter confided it to a third—and thus, in a couple of minutes, the entire company was informed of the presence of the unbidden guest. One of the ladies, with a great aversion to dogs and cats, jumped up screaming from her chair, and excited the laughter of the audience, which was fortunately not numerous. The music went on. The timorous lady was pacified on learning from the lady next her that, on closer investigation, they had found it was no dog, but a young man who was lying under the table. She sat down again laughing, went on with her part—and at length there were heard the last chords of the finale, which struck the poor trembling youth as lasting an eternity.—Scarcely was the curtain dropt, ere Antonio left his retreat in the greatest haste, related rapidly and wildly to the actors, who burst out into laughter, the cause of his concealment, and earnestly begged them not to say anything about the occurrence to his master. He then hurried back into the pit. Going soon afterwards upon the stage, Gassmann, despite all the promises made to poor Antonio, immediately heard of what had happened. On the way home, however, he did not make the least reference to it. He was equally reticent at supper, so that Salieri, who had previously been in a continuous state of anxiety, became gradually confirmed in the belief that his master had really heard nothing. Completely tranquillized, he went to bed. The next morning, at breakfast, there was the same silence. Gassmann went out, and did not return till noon, when he brought with him two friends whom he had invited to dinner. During the repast, the conversation turned on a thousand various topics, but not a word was uttered about the black dog, so that even Salieri himself almost forgot it. At last, when the dessert was served, an Italian coachman entered the room, and enquired what the Court Chapelmaster wished, as he had been sent for in that official's name. "I wished to see you," said Gassmann, "to ask whether you will not soon be returning to Italy, as I want to send home that youth there." Rising quickly from his seat, Antonio excused himself as best he could. Now laughing, now weeping, he related circumstantially the tragico-comic adventure. Gassmann and his guests could not themselves refrain from laughter. At length, Gassmann pronounced absolution—but on the express condition that, in future, Antonio should observe more carefully the orders then given once for all.

As long as Gassmann lived, Salieri drew no salary, properly speaking, for his services at the Court Concerts and in the theatre. But every year he received from the Emperor a Christmas present, at first fifty and then eighty ducats.

At this time (1768) Salieri was introduced by his master to the then very celebrated Metastasio, from whose conversation and remarks he derived much valuable information, especially with regard to rhythmics and declamation.

Gassmann now, also, let him set little things, pieces interpolated in operas and so on, and they were generally executed in public. The alterations and curtailments, likewise, which proved necessary in the scores, were confided by the master to his zealous pupil—so that the term of his apprenticeship, properly speaking, might be considered finished.

Up to the date of Gassmann's death, which occurred in January, 1774, Salieri set to music a series of serious and comic operas, which passed over the stage without any particular success, and were soon forgotten. Armida alone (text by Coltellini), which he composed in 1771, made a more permanent impression. According to Herr von Mosel, the score is one of Salieri's best. But, when Herr von Mosel goes on in terms of praise to say: "So much is certain; the treatment of the text, especially the treatment of the instrumented recitative, the style of the accompaniment, and the structure—so completely scenic" (?)—"of the work, are fully in the spirit of Gluck, and even the warmest admirer of that extraordinary genius would have been compelled, for the beauty and easy flow of the melodies, to have awarded the palm to the Armida of Salieri, if he had not, under the pressure of circumstances, introduced bravura passages," what he says is, to put it mildly, ridiculous. It cannot be absolutely proved that Gluck's advice and aid contributed to the brilliant success of Salieri's opera, but there is every probability that they did. Salieri had made Gluck's acquaintance as far back as 1769, and Gluck, influenced by the young man's attractive and jovial manners, soon became on friendly terms with him. Salieri himself, when speaking of Gluck, gives us to understand that the great master "always liked and encouraged him."

On Gassmann's death, Salieri succeeded to his place as Court Chapelmaster. He was at the same time appointed Chapelmaster to the Italian Opera, while the post of First Chapelmaster, which also Gassmann had filled, was bestowed on Joseph Bono.

From this time dates Salieri's antipathy to Mozart, then vigorously forcing his way up, and the Italian composer was always the chief and ringleader of the anti-Mozart faction, at that epoch, and long afterwards, very numerous in Vienna. The reason of this adverse feeling was not simply the peculiar path struck out by Mozart—a path which caused even Gluck to be unfavourably inclined towards him. Salieri already suspected, perhaps, what a powerful rival he had in the young musician, and thus, as Herr von Mosel himself admits, envy and jealousy were the principal motives of Salieri's invariably hostile bearing towards him. This is a black spot in Salieri's character, though there is no doubt that the Abbate da Ponte, who wrote for Salieri the libretto of Axur, and many others, exaggerates when he pourtrays him thus: "Let us speak no more of Salieri; I know what I have to think about him. I know his intrigues, and those of the Cavalieri. He is an egotist, who will give only his own operas and his own mistresses a chance on the stage." Da Ponte put these words in the mouth of the Emperor Leopold, the successor of Joseph II.; but it is scarcely credible that Leopold can have expressed himself so strongly, though such may have been his meaning. The suspicious Leopold was less favourable to art generally, and to music in particular, than his noble-hearted predecessor. Thus it was not only Da Ponte and his friend Mozart who had reason to complain of being slighted. Who knows what might have happened had Leopold's reign been longer?

MR HENRY LESLIE'S CHOIR.

Mr Henry Leslie has resumed his always welcome performance in St James's Hall. This, his 20th series, encourages hopes of a renewal of that excellence in detail which has made its precursors famous. That the "Choir" is in first-rate order was convincingly shown at the second concert, on Friday evening, the 12th inst, when, in keeping with the season, the entire programme consisted of sacred music. The selection was admirable. The pieces which, on account of their importance, displayed the acquirements of Mr Leslie's fine body of singers, together with his own merits as trainer and conductor, to the highest advantage, were Luca Marenzio's "Magnificat" for double choir, which it is difficult to believe was written not far from three centuries ago; a "Kyrie Eleison" and "Christe Eleison" (the last a fugue in the orthodox old Italian style), by Leonardo Leo, who comes nearer to us by a century; an "Ave verum corpus natum," by Mozart; Mendelssohn's setting for eight-part choir of the 43rd Psalm ("Judge me, O God"); the elder Samuel Wesley's noble motet for double choir, "In exitu Israel;" another motet, "Hosanna to the Son of David," by Orlando Gibbons, who again takes us back a century earlier, and yet another, "The lamentation of Jacob," by Christopher Morales, of Seville, who flourished somewhere about the middle of the sixteenth century. Thus we had examples from the Italian, German, English, and Spanish schools—striking examples, moreover—and nothing was wanted but an excerpt from Lesueur, or some other old, or comparatively old, French musician to make the catalogue, sui generis, unique. The execution of these various pieces was uniformly good, and "Judge me, O God" obtained the customary "encore." For "part-songs," Mr Leslie gave his own appropriate setting of Adelaide Proctor's "Pilgrims," and Mr Henry Smart's beautiful "Ave Maria"—another fair specimen of what English musicians can produce in a particular sphere of art. This, too, was encored.

Among the solo singers must in precedence be mentioned a new comer, Miss Ada Leslie, whose early appearance before the public may be hailed as full of promise. Miss Leslie is very young—so young as reasonably to account for and excuse a timidity which at first militates against the free exhibition of her natural powers. In "Angels ever bright and fair," from Handel's Theodora, this was most apparent, though it failed to deprive the performance of a certain indefinable charm, to be insensible to which was difficult. Further on, in Mr Leslie's own melodious trio, "Love, gentle, holy, pure," her associates being Miss Bolingbroke and Mr Edward Lloyd, the young lady, now completely mistress of her means, had full scope for their display, and made an impression which led to a generally expressed desire on the part of the audience for a re-hearing of the trio—a desire reciprocated without hesitation by the conductor. Not less worthy praise was Miss Leslie's singing in the expressive air, "Blessed are the poor in spirit," from her uncle's oratorio, Immanuel. Miss Leslie's voice, at present a light soprano, is of agreeable quality, especially in the upper tones. She has, we are informed, been studying with Mdme Sainton-Dolby, and certainly holds out promise of being a credit to her accomplished mistress. There were also solos by Mr Edward Lloyd, Miss Bolingbroke, and Mr Riccardi. Mr Lloyd distinguished himself in the tenor air, "His salvation is nigh them," from Sir W. S. Bennett's Woman of Samaria; Miss Bolingbroke (Parepa-Rosa Scholar at the Academy) sang, with irreproachable taste, the "Evening Prayer," from Sir M. Costa's Eli; and Mr Riccardi, who has, we understand, been singing on the stage in Italy, showed (nervousness allowed for), in an air of the last century by Clari, and Handel's "Honour and Arms," a fine bass-baritone voice, from which, with the aid of assiduous study and practice, a great deal ought to come.

Mr Leslie conducted throughout with his well-known ability. Mr J. C. Ward presided at the organ (for which the judicious concert-giver thinks it necessary to make an apology in the programme, as being "a very incomplete instrument, having no swell and but one manual"); and Mr J. G. Callcott played the pianoforte accompaniments. The third concert is to be exclusively devoted to English music, the services of Mr Sims Reeves, whom we hear too seldom now, being specially secured for the occasion. Here an opportunity is afforded, of which Mr Leslie, with the exhaustless repertory of English madrigals, part-songs, glees, &c., ancient and modern, at his command, may (not for the first time) legitimately take advantage.

THE BRITISH ORCHESTRAL SOCIETY.

(From the "Daily Telegraph.")

On Wednesday, in St James's Hall, and in the presence of its patron, the Duke of Edinburgh, this Society entered upon a third season. Circumstances were apparently favourable. The institution is now well known; it enjoys the countenance of the most illustrious amateur in the land; it has to do with British artists only, and exists for nothing save the good of British art. Therefore, arguing from the optimist's point of view, should St James's Hall have been crowded with a brilliant and appreciative audience. We are unfeignedly sorry to say that the result was nothing of the kind. It is notorious that the Society's first twe seasons did not prosper, and now the outlook of the third has been clouded by a scanty gathering and faint encouragement. Why this? The question cannot be answered in few words, but it is easy to indicate some of the reasons demanded. First of all, English amateurs have no special sympathy with native art. Whether they are therefore blameworthy is a distinct consideration; enough that the fact cannot be disputed, since not a few of them are ready to assert that any form of preference for native interests risks injury to higher things. Then, we fear, it must be granted even by lenient judges that the Society's concerts are not of that perfect character which commands success apart from, it may be in spite of, all other considerations. Our musical public are not yet immaculate, but, on the whole, they mete out justice, because they so soon learn to appreciate a really good thing, and are prompt to neglect that which is bad. Hence, if the British Orchestral Society does not secure all the favour it wants, the cause lies more within than without. To speak plainly, the Society's performances are not up to a successful mark. It is more the business of the directors than of ourselves to search out the cause of this—to discover, for example, why an orchestra made up of such competent players cannot act together with unanimity of feeling and expression—why, with the possibility of refinement and delicacy, it is often lacking in those essential qualities—and why, to say much in little, its rendering of great works lacks greatness? These are questions for consideration, and, if the Society is to prosper, they must be considered. Directors, conductor, and orchestra should face the difficulty at once, because it involves life or death. We are sorry to speak thus of a young institution, but it is better to encounter an army of hard facts than to live in a fool's paradise.

The concert of Wednesday night was appropriately devoted to works by the late Sir Sterndale Bennett, whose genius is now better known in consequence of his death than it would have been after many more years of life. One might find easy excuse for believing ourselves to have just determined that Sterndale Bennett was a composer worth notice. While he lived, it seemed a matter of indifference whether he wrote or not; being dead, we hunt up every scrap of paper bearing his autograph, and hold it up to worship. But this was the way of the world when the world was young; and, whatever may be the case with individuals, the aggregate of humanity does not gain wisdom from the lapse of time. The programme chosen on the occasion under notice included the best known of Bennett's works; as, for example, the Symphony in G minor, the Naiades and Paradise and the Peri overtures, and the Concerto (No. 4) in F minor. Upon these we need not dwell, nor is it necessary, after what has been said, to discuss the performance minutely. The solo pianist was Miss Florence May, whose ability appeared far more evident than at Mr Leslie's recent concert. Nervousness damaged the first movement of Bennett's charming concerto; and the young lady is not yet finished artist enough to do entire justice to the barcarolle, but she played the brilliant and difficult finale in a manner that held out great promise. Let Miss May persevere. The vocalists were Miss Wynne, Miss Roche, Mr Guy, and Mr Wadmore; by whom a choice selection of Bennett's songs and concerted pieces were efficiently sung. Mr Mount conducted as usual.

ROYAL ALBERT HALL.

If the Welsh concert at the Albert Hall was a success, the evening this week devoted to the music of Ireland, and that which passes for it, was a still greater one. It is seldom so liberal an attendance has been witnessed in this gigantic building—again betokening the popular ascendancy of the "ballad" over matter of more value. The names of the singers, however, were as attractive as the songs they sang. Madame Lemmens-Sherrington, Madame Patey, and Miss Julia Elton, Mr Vernon Rigby, and Signor Foli, if not too well, were at least prettily, employed in warbling the Irish tunes set down for them, and the vigorous applause they met with, and the frequency of the encores, may be easily imagined. To Madame Lemmens-Sherrington fell "Rich and rare were the gems she wore," and "Come back to Erin, Mavourneen, Mavourneen;" to Madame Patey, "The meeting of the waters," "The minstrel boy," and "What will you do, love?"; and to Miss Julia Elton, "The harp that once thro' Tara's halls," and "Terence's farewell"—an assemblage of ditties well calculated to tempt the common ear and excite it with the keenest pleasure. On the other hand, Mr Vernon Rigby dealt with "The Irish emigrant," and "Eily, Mavourneen;" and Signor Foli, "The Exile of Erin," "Ould Ireland, you're my darlin'," and "Kitty Tyrrell"—another group of songs belonging to a class in which mixed audiences are wont to take unbounded delight. How well these songs—all of them, it need hardly be said, more or less sentimental—were sung, it is superfluous to say. It is sufficient to mention the fact that they were received with the usual boisterous approval; and that Mr Randegger, who accompanied them throughout with his customary dainty neatness, had a busy time of it in attending to the calls and recalls, and in fighting helplessly against the encores. Things not exactly unsophisticated Irish were from time to time administered—as, for instance, Pinsuti's "Irlanda," a setting of "The Last Rose of Summer," with a choral prologue and background, in which Mdme Lemmens-Sherrington and Mr Vernon Rigby each took effective part, and another choral setting, called "Erin, the tear and the smile in thine eyes," for which the tune of "Robin Adair" supplied the outline. The part music, besides the above, included Dr Stewart's arrangement of "The wine cup is circling," "Silent, O Moyle," "Believe me, if all those endearing young charms," and "The Cruiskeen Lawn," all of which, under the skilful direction of Mr Barnby, were sung with delicacy and expression. Mr Levy, without whose cornet a popular concert would be considered incomplete, gave his well-known exemplifications of "The Exile's Lament," "The Low-Backed Car," and other airs, and worked up the enthusiasm of the higher occupants of the hall to the usual boiling point. THE COST OF OPERA HOUSES.

I have lately been staying for a few weeks in Paris, and have naturally visited the new Operahouse. I have read various accounts in The Times and other London newspapers, describing the wonders of that building, but I have not seen any account of its cost. The following particulars are taken from a publication which has all the appearance of emanating from official sources, and may be interesting to your readers. It appears that the cost of the ground averaged 2,000f. per superficial metre (about one-seventh in area more than a superficial yard), and this, together with sums paid as compensations for the expropriation of proprietors and tenants, amounted to the aggregate sum of 50,000,000f., or £2,000,000. The first sum voted towards the construction of the building was 600,000f. in 1861, and then various sums annually up to and inclusive of 1874, amounting in all to 35,400,000f. In addition to this there was then still required for finishing and furnishing the edifice the sum of 15,000,000f. additional, so that the total cost of realizing this grand Imperial project amounted in round numbers to £4,000,000—that is, £2,000,000 for the ground, and £2,000,000 for the building. After all, the general opinion appears to be that, setting aside the magnificent entrances, corridors, and salons, the theatre—that is, the audience portion as well as the stage—is considerably too small, and contrasts disadvantageously both with the new Operahouse at Moscow and with the Royal Italian Operahouse in London, the two most recent similar constructions, the former of which only cost about two millions of roubles, or £300,000, and Covent Garden a sum not greatly exceeding £270,000; in the latter case all the furnishing and fittings, as well as the machinery, scenery, and costumes for a considerable number of operas, being included. To pay 5 per cent. on the outlay of the Paris Opera, a rental of £100,000 per annum would therefore be required; but the director, who is also the speculator, has not only no rent at all to pay, but receives from the Government 800,000f., or upwards of £32,000 per annum, "just to help him on." Your obedient servant.

AMATEUR.

CRYSTAL PALACE CONCERTS.

At the Crystal Palace concert on Saturday the chief attraction was Herr Joachim's MS. concerto in G, for violin, with orchestral accompaniments. This work is as different in style from his great "Hungarian Concerto" in D minor—which has been played on several occasions in London, and, moreover, is published—as one piece of music can well be different from another. It is, nevertheless, though far less pretentious, equally attractive. The themes are all melodious, happily contrasted, and thoroughly well fitted for that ample development in the employment of which Herr Joachim so eminently excels. The orchestration from beginning to end exhibits consummate skill; and the solo passages, as often brilliant as they are ever graceful and effective, seem not so much independent media for the advantageous exhibition of the performer's mechanical dexterity as integral parts, inseparable from the rest, so ingeniously are they contrived and intermingled. The whole is conducted with masterly ease, and from first to last the melody goes on with natural and unimpeded flow. Each movement has its marked characteristic; and not the least charming of the three is that which is at the same time the briefest and most unpretending—the andante. The finale, a rondo full of vigorous life, and carried on with ever-increasing spirit, is a worthy climax to a work in all respects remarkable—so remarkable, indeed, as to cause general surprise that its author should have allowed it to lie fallow since 1864, when it was introduced at the London Philharmonic Concerts. That the performance—all that could possibly be wished—was received with genuine enthusiasm may be taken for granted. It is difficult, in fact, to imagine anything nearer perfection than Herr Joachim's playing throughout; and it must be added that in the accompaniments the great artist received invaluable support from Mr Manns and his orchestra. It is to be hoped that we may hear a little more of the concerto in G, which (like one of its predecessors in G minor, by the way) has too long been allowed to pass unheeded. Later in the concert Herr Joachim gave three movements (Prelude, Minuet, and Gavotte) from J. S. Bach's Sonata in E, for violin, unaccompanied, in his accustomed manner, and with the accustomed results—neither standing in need of description.

The concert began with Mr W. G. Cusins' clever and dramatically conceived overture, suggested by Victor Hugo's Travailleurs de la Mer (first time); and ended with the impassioned and beautiful orchestral prelude to Genoveva, Schumann's one opera. The pièce de resistance was the now everywhere popular Reformation Symphony of Mendelssohn, which has seldom, if ever, been more magnificently played, even at the Crystal Palace. The, in its way inimitable, allegro vivace (scherzo) was, as always, unanimously called for again, and, as a matter of course, repeated. It is sad to think that the gifted author himself should never have enjoyed the opportunity of hearing a work to which he had looked forward with such earnest interest (as his letters from Paris declare), performed in public by a competent orchestra.

The solo singers on Saturday were Mdlle Helene Arnim, who gave an air from Handel's Semele and Lieder by Brahms and Schumann, with so much musical feeling that her first appearance at the Crystal Palace is not likely to be her last; and Miss Ethel Morland, who, at a moment's notice, filled the place left vacant through the indisposition of Miss Edith Wynne, in Mr Frederick Clay's graceful song, "She wandered down the mountain side," and Herr Ganz's popular "Nightingale's trill," acquitting herself more than creditably.

For the concert of to-day we are promised Schumann's symphony in D minor; Weber's Euryanthe overture; Ferdinand Hiller's "Dramatic Fantasia," for orchestra; and a concerto of Viotti's, by the queen of lady violinists, Madame Norman-Neruda.

MUSIC IN MANCHESTER.

(From our Correspondent.)

Our musical season was formerly supposed to end about the time of the commencement of the operatic season in London, but now it sometimes extends into the early summer months, and we are certainly not near the close yet. Since my last letter, the lovers of music have had no cause to complain of anything like want of opportunity for gratifying their inclinations, as there has been a concert of some importance nearly every night. The most interesting feature of Mr Hallé's last miscellaneous concert was the director's own performance of Beethoven's beautiful C major Concerto, which was received with enthusiastic applause. A new overture by Gernsheim, a work of considerable merit—scholarly, but not too severe, was also played with success at this concert. Miss Sophie Löwe and Mr Lloyd were the singers, and both were heard with great pleasure. Mr Hallé's last concert was given on Thursday last, when one of the finest performances of the Elijah ever given in Manchester delighted a crowded audience. The solo singers were Mdme Lemmens, Mdme Patey, Mr Vernon Rigby, and Mr Santley.

At the Concert Hall, last week, the directors gave a charming concert of classical chamber music, supported by Messrs Hallé, Joachim, and Piatti. You have already inserted the programme of this concert, and I need not tell you what our local amateurs thought of Beethoven's beautiful Trio founded on the air, "Ich bin der Schneider Kakadu." What the distinguished executants thought of the behaviour of the uncourteous people who advertised their own indifference at the expense of their neighbours' comfort and convenience, I should be sorry to have to say. On Monday last there was another pleasant concert at the Concert Hall. Here is the programme of the evening:—

Grand Symphony in C major—Mozart; Air, "Das Gold" (Fidelio) (Herr Behrens)—Beethoven; Cavatina, "Or la sull' onda" (Giuramento) (Mdme Trebelli-Bettini)—Mercadante; Andante in B flat, from Symphony in D minor—Spohr; Duet (Mdme Trebelli-Bettini and Herr Behrens)—Flotow; Overture, Melusina—Mendelssohn; Air, "Der Wanderer" (Herr Behrens)—Schubert; Air, "O Salutaris" (Messe Solennelle) (Mdme Trebelli-Bettini)—Rossini; Entr'acte (Manfred)—Reinecke; Leibeslied—Taubert; Cavatina, "Quando a te liete" (Mdme Trebelli-Bettini)—Gounod; Swedish Songs, "Trollhattan" and "Swinahirden" (Herr Behrens); March, "Tarpeja" (Beethoven).

The orchestral selections were all interesting, and all well played. Mdme Trebelli was in splendid voice, and sang with irreproachable finish—did she ever sing with anything else? was her voice ever in anything but excellent condition? Not in Manchester, so far as I can remember. Mdme Trebelli's voice, indeed, would be a fortune if she could not sing; and certainly, if she had the faintest possible "pipe," her singing would always gratify the genuine lovers of musical art. Herr Behrens created a very favourable impression. He had previously appeared here in opera, with decided success, and he promises to be a valuable addition to the limited number of first-class bass singers.

At the last concert of the Vocal Society, a programme of new and old glees, part-songs, &c., was varied by the solo singing of Mdme Patey and Mr George Fox.

But no recent musical event has been more interesting to local amateurs than the performance, for the first time in England, of Max Bruch's Odysseus, by the St Cecilia Amateur Choral Society, under the direction of Mr Ed. Hecht. The event took place on Saturday evening at the Free Trade Hall. There was a large attendance; and the Funds of the Children's Hospital will be considerably increased by the result. One of the local newspapers thus speaks of the work itself:—

"Herr Bruch has treated the story of Ulysses with the freedom of an artist and with the refinement of a poet. He is scholarly without being pedantic; and, while avoiding the traditional method of treating stories from the Greek poets originated by Gluck, he has kept clear of the mistakes of Schumann in "Paradise and the Peri, and of the rhapsodical style of Herr Wagner and his disciples. Odysseus is, indeed, a melodious and picturesque cantata, charmingly varied, and some of its numbers contain dramatic music of a very high character. The composer possesses not merely the requisite knowledge of orchestral effect, but the rare faculty of weaving together the instrumental with the vocal score in perfect and duly balanced combination, and the display of appropriate orchestral colour is one of the distinguishing characteristics of the new cantata. The popular success on Saturday was unmistakable; it is always easy to perceive when an audience is really pleased; and, though much of the gratification on Saturday was due to the fine performance, it may be said without hesitation that the music itself gave general satisfaction and delight. The cantata is divided into ten sections; several of the most exciting of the hero's adventures are omitted, and the libretto by its character is of necessity somewhat fragmentary, yet, in listening to the work, we were surprised by its compactness and completeness. The first part includes 'Odysseus on Calypso's Island,' 'Odysseus in Hades,' 'Odysseus and the Sirens,' 'The Tempest at Sea,' and the second Penelope mourning; Nausikaa; the Banquet with the Phaiakes; Penelope Weaving a Garment, the Return, and the Festival in Ithaca. In illustration of every one of these scenes the composer has written very effective music. Some of it is pretty, and almost pastoral in character. The storm is exceedingly clever, and several of the choruses are both powerful and dignified."

The singing of the amateur choir was admirable throughout, and those members who had solos were remarkably effective. Mr Santley, who had generously volunteered his invaluable services, did ample justice to the music of Odysseus. I shall be very much surprised if this beautiful work is not heard before long in London; and I believe it would have repaid the composer for the trouble of coming to England had he been present at the performance of Saturday. Certainly he never heard his music more magnificently sung than by Mr Santley.

Next week Mr Mapleson will give three operas: Semiramide, Rigoletto, and Der Freischütz, at the Queen's Theatre; and M. Rivière will commence a series of promenade concerts at the Prince's Theatre, where Mr Cellier's opera, The Sultan of Mecha, is still being nightly played to crowded houses.

BAYREUTH.

(From a Correspondent.)

During the winter, the artists who are to take part in the preliminary rehearsals here next July have been preparing for their task, more than one having received instruction from Wagner himself, during his recent stay at Leipsic. Next winter, three conductors, specially appointed, will visit the towns of Germany, and rehearse with artists who may be unable to leave the theatres at which they are engaged. These are Herren Lampe, Seidel, and Richter, who have got up the Trilogy with the composer, and are conversant with his slightest intentions. The following is the cast, as far as at present determined:—Brunhilde, Mad. Fr. Materna, of Vienna; Erda, Mdlle Oppenheim, of Frankfort; Siegfried, Herr Glatz, of Pesth; Siegmund, Herr Betz, of Berlin; Wodan, Herr Niemann, of Berlin; Hagen, Herr Scaria, of Dresden; Alberic, Herr Hill, of Schwerin; and the two Giants, Herr Eilers, of Cobourg, and Herr Weiss, of Breslau. Mad. Lehmann, of Cologne; Mad. Grünn, of Gotha; and Herr Gura, will also figure in the cast, but it is not decided what characters they will assume.

The frequent change of scene will be effected by the aid of machinery. Each scene will be removed in its entirety, without any necessity of rolling up the back scene, or "cloth," or running off the wings; it will either be raised or lowered out of sight. For this purpose there is ample space both above and below the stage. By the reverse process, the scene following will be lowered or raised into its place. The stage-carpenters will be banished to the flies or the depths below the stage. Behind the scenes there will be only six officials—good musicians, conversant with the piece—to regulate the entrances of the artists and the proper working of the scenery.

Though the Grand-National-Festival-Stage-Play-Theatre is only a temporary structure, Herr Wagner has announced that, after the representation of his own Trilogy, he intends giving from time to time model performances of the masterpieces of the German lyric drama. The first opera on his list is said to be Fidelio.

STUTTGART.—A medal in honour of Herr R. Wagner has been struck here. On one side is the bust of the composer; on the other a representation of the Grand-National-Festival-Stage-Play-Theatre at Baireuth.

MUSIC IN BERLIN.

(From a Correspondent.)

After repeating Flotow's Ombra, the Italian operatic company under the management of Mad. Artôt gave, in the Theatre Royal, Cimarosa's Matrimonio segreto. Sig. Arditi conducted, while Signore Artôt, Cristino, Savelli, Signori Paolino, Graziosi, and Caracciolo sustained the chief characters.

The event at the Royal Operahouse lately has been the performance of Raimund's old fairy piece, Der Verschwender, with Kreutzer's music. Referring to this work and certain modern productions produced here, Herr Ferdinand Gumbert observes, in the Neue Berliner Musikzeitung:—

"A house filled in every part proved that the taste of our public is not so depraved, after all, within the brilliant walls of the Operahouse, when it thus welcomes a harmless fairy tale with every sign of genuine interest, so utterly unlike certain modern pieces."

The cast included Mesdes Mallinger, Meyer, and Frieb-Blumauer, Herren Betz, Vollmer, Berndal, Kahle, and Döring. The scenery and dresses were good and appropriate. The other productions of the week have been Il Trovatore, Lohengrin, La Dame Blanche, and Les Huguenots.

Lortzing's comic opera, Der Wildschütz, was performed at the Friedrich-Wilhelmstädtisches Theater for the benefit of the conductor, Herr Kleffel.

A successful concert was given a short time since in the rooms of the Singacademie by two former pupils of Professor Wüerst, Herr Moritz Moskowitz and Herr Philipp Scharwenka, assisted by Professor Ludwig von Brenner, and the Berlin Symphonic-Orchestra. The programme consisted exclusively of compositions by the two concert-givers.

FANATICISM.

(From "Talk on 'Change," in Liverpool Journal.)

Lord Dudley, the lover of, and advertiser for, jewels, is not the only person in this curious country who thinks there is danger and impropriety in good sacred music, or, at least, that it is out of place in a building used for religious purposes. His lordship and his friends, the fastidious Canons of Worcester, would probably laugh if they saw the Moody and Sankey building in Victoria Street, and were told that anybody could attach anything like a notion of sanctity to a mere preposterous and over-grown hut. The talk was, however, that while Englishmen differ in other respects, they all agree in being on certain points strongly sanctimonious and fanatical; that there are gentlemen of good intentions and deeply pious feelings who are just as anxious to keep Victoria Hall from being profaned by a burst of noble religious melody and harmony as their eminent fellow Christian can be as to keeping Mr Sims Reeves and Mr Santley and a miscellaneous chorus out of Worcester Cathedral; that, if report is to be believed, the committee of the Moody and Sankey services have taken the extraordinary step of either officially or unofficially declining to allow their building to be used for the rendering even of Handel's great and absolutely Christian and devotional work, the grandest and sweetest of his oratorios; that an offer is alleged to have been made to them which it seems most strange should have been declined; that the proposal to give the oratorio came from gentlemen, and especially from one gentleman, who may be fully relied upon not only to secure a good performance, but to take care that everything shall be done decently and in order; that the contractor who erected the building joined in the proposal, and was ready to help it by every means in his power; that he offered to make all the alterations required for £50, and expressed his intention of giving that sum to the charities; that the givers of the concert also proposed to devote the proceeds of the whole affair to the same benevolent object; that they were told, however, on authority which they did not doubt, though they certainly ought to verify it, that the hall, "having been erected for religious purposes," could not be used for musical performances, even of the most sacred character; that it is to be hoped that a certain very good man and excellent musician may be forgiven his profanity in having exclaimed "in his haste" and indignation, "They cry 'Come to Jesus' and won't let the people go to the Messiah;" that though this epigram may sound rather rough, it really expresses a very real truth which these fanciful Christians might well have borne in mind; that Handel's Messiah has probably "converted" as many, and has certainly edified and done good to many more, than are likely to be benefited by Mr Moody's preaching or the tenderest of Mr Sankey's musically ungrammatical ditties; and that, in any case, it is to ordinary persons inconceivable how the reverent representation of such a work could be otherwise than acceptable and appropriate in a building devoted to sacred purposes.

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

As Mr Chappell's season draws to a close—and, unhappily, the end is now very near—amateurs show an increased desire to make the most of what remains. This, in part, accounts for the crowded state of St James's Hall on Monday evening, but we imagine that a still more special reason should be taken into account. The posthumous quartets of Beethoven, so long set down, even by connoisseurs, as examples of the eccentricity with which genius is often allied, are now among the most powerful attractions in the repertory of these concerts, especially when associated with the executive talent of Herr Joachim. We have no desire to overrate the significance of this; nor will we go so far as to say that the remarkable works in question are much better understood now than they were twenty years ago. Musicians still find in them a theme for wonder, and not less than formerly, perhaps, are they "caviare to the general." But this, at all events, has happened—the musical public have fallen under the influence of a great man's name, and Beethoven's most abstruse utterances are heard, not with curiosity alone, but with a reverent desire to learn the secret of their meaning. So it happens that whenever, as usual during Herr Joachim's term at St James's Hall, the director puts forward a posthumous quartet, a crowd assembles eager to profit by an opportunity valuable in itself, and made more so through comparative rarity. The quartet played by MM. Joachim, Ries, Straus, and Piatti on Monday night was the famous "C sharp minor," the very name of which will at once suggest all that is most characteristic in Beethoven's latest style. We are wholly at a loss what to say about this composition without repeating the weak and unsatisfying generalities for which it and its companions have often furnished an excuse. Nothing would be easier than to oppress the quartet with adjectives, and make it serve as a peg on which to hang fine writing, but cui bono? Such music may be "analyzed," but those who would go deeper than means and forms of expression had better save their labour, for the posthumous works of Beethoven belong to things in nature and art which resent officious interpretation, and demand the liberty to work their own effect upon each individual mind. Enough, therefore, if we state that the quartet, led by Herr Joachim in his noblest manner, was heard with attention to the end. Beethoven had another representative at this concert; that is, if we may look upon the composer of the "C sharp minor," and he who wrote the trio in G minor (Op. 9), as one and the same. Really they were two, having little in common of all the things which go to make up individuality. When the trio appeared, Beethoven of the quartet existed only as the man may be said to exist in the little child; and, after hearing the works representative of both periods, our marvel was not so much that the same art could adapt itself to the expression of thoughts so wide asunder, as that in a few years Beethoven could cover all the ground between them. In this vast power of progression the master stood alone; nor does he seem likely to have a companion. Respecting the third concerted work played on Monday evening—Mozart's sonata in E flat, for pianoforte (Mdlle Krebs) and violin (Herr Joachim)—we need only observe that its production now for the first time should not be regarded as evidence against its value. Many of its fellows have been preferred it is true, but not many are so strongly marked by the composer's tunefulness, grace, and symmetry. As her pianoforte solo, Mdlle Krebs introduced Chopin's Ballade in G minor. The songs of the evening were sung by Mdlle Sophie Löwe, in whose version of Lieder by Mendelssohn, Chopin, and Schubert, not a few special excellences appeared.

This day (Saturday) the concert will be for the benefit of Signor Piatti, and on Monday the able and energetic director closes his season with the usual special concert given in his name. Both gentlemen should have—and we are sure they will have—"bumpers."

BRUSSELS.—La Reine de Chypre has not yet been given, and nothing more is heard of Le Nozze, long promised and anxiously expected at the Théâtre Royal de la Monnaie. The only novelty has been Fra Diavolo; but Auber's sparkling music was ill executed, and Scribe's sparkling libretto as ill acted. Such performances explain M. Campocasso's non-success as a manager. People are on the tiptoe of expectation for Mad. Christine Nilsson, who will appear six times. She will open, it is said, in Faust, to be followed by Hamlet and Mignon.

CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY MUSICAL PROFESSORSHIP.

(From "The Times," March 17.)

The election of a Professor of Music, in the place of the late Sir Sterndale Bennett, has resulted in the almost unanimous choice of Mr George Alexander Macfarren, the eminent composer. Since the declaration of the vacancy numerous candidates offered themselves for the vacant Chair, but retired upon being informed of the influential support already promised to Mr Macfarren by the residents. Dr Wylde, the Gresham Professor of Music, remained in the field as a candidate; a London committee was formed to promote his election, and up to noon yesterday a contest seemed inevitable. Eventually Dr Wylde withdrew. As a poll had been announced, however, the formality was carried out. The Vice-Chancellor and Proctors attended at the hour previously appointed, and at eight this evening declared the election to have fallen on Mr Macfarren. By a recent Grace of the Senate, the new Professor will receive an annual stipend of £200; and, in addition to examining the exercises for musical degrees, will deliver a course of lectures on Music during each academical year.

PALMAM qui meruit ferat. The old "saw," which so many are disposed to regard as a satire upon actualities, is but a reflection of the logic of events. As a rule, he who deserves reward gains it. The honour may be long in coming; may go astray en route, like a mis-delivered letter; may even be delayed till Death steps in, but, sooner or later, it comes. In this respect, the mill of Providence grinds slowly, but grinds with exceeding fineness, leaving nothing to pass without the impress of divine justice. It is needless to dwell upon this fact—one which wise men in all ages have recognized, but our reference to it comes appropriately in view of Mr Macfarren's election as Musical Professor in the University of Cambridge. Somewhat late in life, but not too late for the probability of years of enjoyment springing from faithful discharge of high duties, the most learned of English musicians finds himself in rank, as in acquirement, at the head of his profession. Than he who is at once Cambridge Professor and Principal of the Royal Academy of Music, there can be no greater. Mr Macfarren—apart from the Knighthood which he may possibly have to share with a batch of provincial mayors, or the Sheriffs of London and Middlesex—has reached the most exalted place open to an English musician, and the labours of his life have, in this respect, been "crowned." Very likely no one is surprised at his Cambridge success, or unready to deny the possibility of anybody outrunning him in the race. Mr Macfarren needs no more splendid testimony to his worth than this general acquiescence in his election; but, at the same time, it is very easy to see how he might have been defeated. For some reason or other, which does no credit to the wisdom of Alma Mater, the election of Professors at Cambridge is vested in a miscellaneous body called the Senate. The members of this, no doubt, learned and highly respectable corporation, are scattered all over the country—many of them as much severed from the University in thought and sympathy as they are by distance, and very few of them able to discriminate, if they were disposed to try, among the claims of candidates to a special dignity such as the Chair of Music. These non-resident members are a majority, and a candidate favourably circumstanced in the matter of social influence, or endowed with personal qualities such as make men favourites, has only to lay himself out to secure their votes in order to achieve success. The danger of this result is over for the present, but the risk will have to be run whenever the election—absit omen—is repeated; and its existence should be taken into account by those who are desirous that the best man should win. Of the gentlemen who came forward as Mr Macfarren's rivals, only one, perhaps, intended a serious struggle for the place. Dr Wylde evidently meant business, and only withdrew at the last moment, when the impossibility of success became obvious. We have nothing to say against Dr Wylde's candidature, now that the issue has been determined. A Gresham professor has surely the right to try and make himself a Cambridge professor; nor can he be accused of over-vaulting ambition. The remaining candidates may be divided into two classes; first, those who, like Mr Barnby, desired chiefly to put themselves en evidence in the matter of a professorship. The post is one to which a rising musician may aspire with perfect fitness, and no rising musician has a more unquestionable right to connect his name with the possibilities of the future in this respect than the conductor of the Albert Hall concerts. The second class is made up of those crotchet-mongers and ambitious nobodies who are always coming to the front when there is an opportunity of catching the public eye. These characters are found everywhere, and not even the late Sir Peter Laurie could have put them down had he tried. Some of them are, or have been, representative men. There was a butcher at Tiverton, when Lord Palmerston was member for that Devonian burgh, who always broke a lance with the statesman at election time, and was regularly tumbled in the mud, to the vast delight of the natives. And there is still, we believe, a Mr Jones, for whom, at every choice of Lord Mayor and Sheriffs, the livery of London in Common Hall assembled, look as confidently as for east winds in May. Upon such people it is impossible to think seriously, and the best course is to get as much fun out of them as possible. For this course some of the recent candidates gave abundant opportunity, and answered the end of making the world merrier, if not exactly wiser. But the lesson of the whole matter is one adapted to encourage. Virtually unopposed, the best man has gained the prize, and merit wears, as well as deserves, the palm.

With Mr Macfarren in the Cambridge Chair of Music, we may confidently expect a good return of labour done. He is not likely to be satisfied with a perfunctory discharge of imperative duty, but rather to accomplish more than his bond exacts. Henceforth, not only will there be musical lectures at the junior University, but, we may hope, a quickened musical life, which shall bring about a higher regard for the art among those who are destined to exert vast influence in shaping the public opinion of the country. Should results like these follow Mr Macfarren's election, the anticipations of not a few will be realized; and, once more, Wisdom will be justified of her children.

We hear, on good authority, that Mr Carl Rosa will begin a season of English opera (and opera in English), at the Princess's theatre in September next. Everybody wishes him success.

DEATH OF MR LUMLEY.

(From the "Times.")

Mr Benjamin Lumley, for many years manager of the Italian Opera in the Haymarket, died on Wednesday night, at his residence, No. 8, Kensington Crescent, aged 64, after an illness which for months had confined him to his bed. In 1842, Mr Lumley succeeded Mr Laporte as director of Her Majesty's Theatre. He had for several years previously been that gentleman's confidential adviser, and undertook, at the solicitation of some of the most influential patrons of the opera, to fill his place just at a time when difficulties were accumulating which threatened the very existence of the establishment. How these were surmounted by the new impresario; the brilliancy of his early reign; the straits to which he was reduced by the sudden and unexpected secession of his conductor and the majority of his principal artists, vocal and instrumental, leading to the formidable opposition at Covent Garden; how, with the assistance of the late Balfe, and the memorable 4th of May (1847) which introduced Jenny Lind to the English public, he again made the fortunes of the opera look promising; the subsequent difficulties when "the Swedish Nightingale" joined Mr Barnum in the United States; the brilliant, but evanescent, apparition of Sophie Cruvelli; the closing of Her Majesty's Theatre from 1852 to 1856, its re-opening, after the Royal Italian Opera was destroyed by fire, in the last-named year, with Piccolomini and Giuglini; the début of Thérese Tietjens in 1858; and the second closing of the theatre, and consequent abdication of its director—these, one and all, must be more or less fresh in the memory of opera-goers of the period. Since 1858, Mr Lumley's name, in connexion with the opera, has only once been brought into public notice; this was in 1863, when Piccolomini came from Italy expressly to give three representations at Drury Lane Theatre for the benefit of her former director. Whatever the vicissitudes of his career, Mr Lumley will be remembered, not only as one of the ablest, most active, and enterprising, but also as one of the most courteous and universally popular of theatrical managers. Should his biography ever be written (his autobiography exists), it will not be forgotten that he designed and carried out the Pas de Quatre, and brought forward Jenny Lind—two of the most absorbing topics at the time of their occurrence of which operatic records can make mention.

Signor Schira has returned from Italy. So marked was the success of Selvaggio at Venice, that his new opera, Leah, has been unconditionally accepted for next Carnival.

Philharmonic Society.—We must reserve until next week our notice of the first Philharmonic concert in St James's Hall, under the direction of Mr W. G. Cusins. We can only say, now, that the music composed by Sterndale Bennett for the Ajax of Sophocles proved worthy of our great composer's fame, and that the Funeral March is a masterpiece—worthy to rank side by side with that of Beethoven.

WHEN MEYERBEER WAS REALLY BORN.

Dans les dates inscrites aux bustes des compositeurs qui ornent la façade du nouvel Opéra, nous regrettons de voir se perpétuer une erreur souvent commise. La date de la naissance de Meyerbeer est le 5th Septembre, 1791, nous l'avons déjà dit et nous pouvons l'affirmer de nouveau, d'après les documents les plus authentiques. Les biographies donnent généralement l'année 1794; ce renseignement est inexact, à quelque source qu'il ait été puisé provînt-il de Meyerbeer lui-même. Il n'est point de grand homme qui n'ait sa coquetterie: celle de l'auteur des Huguenots était de se rajeunir. Il se disait même quelquefois né en 1796.—Revue et Gazette Musicale.

OCCASIONAL NOTES.

Mr Mapleson advertises the opening of her Majesty's Opera (Drury Lane) for the 10th prox. His prospectus is not yet issued, but that a conspicuous feature will be Wagner's Lohengrin, with Tietjens, Nilsson, and Campanini as Ortrud, Elsa and Lohengrin, may be taken for granted. The engagement of the Italian tragedian Salvini for a series of representations has, of course, nothing to do with the operatic business.

It is now arranged that Verdi's Requiem for Alessandro Manzoni is to be performed at Albert Hall, early in May, under the immediate direction of its composer. The four solo singers are to be Mesdames Stolz and Waldman, Signors Macini and Medini (the originals at Milan). Verdi is composing a Funeral Symphony, with choruses, to be played when the remains of Donizetti are removed from the cemetery in the neighbourhood of Bergamo to the new resting place prepared for him in the Cathedral of his native town.

The projected Festival at Rouen, to celebrate the centenary of the birth of Boieldieu, is assuming large proportions, and, it is anticipated, will appeal to amateurs far and wide. Specimens from many of Boieldieu's most esteemed compositions are included in the programme—even from Athalie and Télémaque, written when he was attached to the Russian Court, and hitherto unknown to the majority of his compatriots. Boieldieu was born on the 16th of December, 1775; but it is deemed expedient to hold the festival in the summer, and the dates now fixed are the 12th, 13th, and 14th of June.

At the last concert of the Paris Conservatoire, Beethoven's Choral Symphony and fragments of Gluck's Iphigénie en Aulide were performed, the conductor being M. Lamoureux, Handel's untiring apostle among Parisians. At the Cirque d'Hiver the "Popular Concerts" continue in favour. M. Pasdeloup has taken recently to patronize struggling French musicians, for which he deserves credit. His latest programme contained an overture to an opera called Sigurd, by M. Reyer, and a fragment from the Marie Magdalene of M. Massenet. Both made an impression, even side by side with the Jupiter symphony of Mozart, the symphony in D of Beethoven, and Mendelssohn's music to A Midsummer Night's Dream. Something, no doubt, must be allowed to the account of patriotic feeling; but MM. Rever and Massenet, apart from prejudice, have done enough to entitle them to consideration.

In an article on the strange exhibition of Messrs Moody and Sankey, the Spectator writes:—

"Mr Sankey's main power is in his solo-singing, which is full of sweetness and genuine tenderness of tone. On Tuesday night, his singing of the hymn 'Jesus of Nazareth passeth by,' and on Wednesday, at Exeter Hall, of that on 'The Lost Sheep,' especially the feeling with which he sang, 'Out in the desert He heard its cry, sick and helpless and ready to die,' were distinguished by a delicacy and serenity of expression hardly to be too much admired."

The Saturday Review says of the same performance:—

"The quality of Mr Sankey's voice and his style of singing are questions of taste on which there will be great difference of opinion. There can be no doubt, however, that his art is of a tricky kind, and aims at producing effect by sudden alterations between high and low. His favourite note is one in the back of his throat, with which he pours forth a prolonged and hollow O! O! O! something between a howl and a wail, which makes one think of a melodious costermonger crying his cabbages. Whether it is pure art or not, it appears to be agreeable to the majority of the audience, and it may be thought that that is enough."

Who shall decide when doctors disagree?

There has been a great deal of pianoforte-playing during the past week; and the piano—nuisance as it is when persistently hammered at by one's nearest neighbours—is the only instrument on which an idea can be given of the grandest and most elaborate orchestral composition, and on which the great majority of orchestral works can be faithfully reproduced: necessarily in a compact form, but without loss of any of the main features of the original. An ingenious French writer, in defending the unfortunate man who a few months ago burned down Herz's pianoforte manufactory, pointed out that he might have done so in a moment of justifiable indignation. In Paris the practice of living in flats (not altogether unknown in London) is carried out in a very literal sense; and a lodger may and generally does find himself, in virtue of that arrangement, with pianos above him, pianos beneath him, pianos in front of him, pianos all round him. It has been suggested that, hearing on one side the waltz from La Jolie Parfumeuse; on another, the quadrille from Madame Angot; upstairs, the serenade from La Timbale d'Argent; downstairs, the drinking song from Giroflé-Girofla, the poor victim might at last have said to himself that this could be endured no longer; and, determined to strike the evil in its root, had hurried, matchbox in hand, to the nearest pianoforte manufactory. To have ended heroically, he should have perished in the conflagration he had himself caused, when succeeding generations would have called him "the Erostratus of music." As it is, the misguided man—who, we believe, was found guilty "with extenuating circumstances"—will be sent to a place where he will have no pianos, and where silence will from time to time be broken only by the voice of the gaoler. He deserves his fate. There are certain wrongs to which we must all submit. Philosophy, like Thalberg's "art of singing," must be "applied to the piano;" and young ladies in thousands and tens of thousands must be allowed, under pretext of playing their scales, to practise for hours together a sort of musical file-firing ("the art of war applied to the piano," this may be called) in order that here and there from among the countless host may arise a genuine artist.

CONCERTS VARIOUS.

Mdme Greiffenhagen's soirée musicale, given at her residence, Upper Bedford Place, attracted a large number of her friends and pupils. A new cantata, The Maid of Gascony, composed by Mr J. H. Gordon, a young and clever musical student, was produced on the occasion. The solos were entrusted to the Misses Helen Muir, Brincken, Clark, and Henley, Messrs Stanley Smith and Kenningham. The cantata pleased much, and was conducted by the composer, who also presided at the pianoforte. The second part of the programme consisted of a solo on the pianoforte, played by Mr Gordon, and several popular songs and duets, sung by the pupils of Mdme Greiffenhagen.

Soiree of Mdlle de Bono, the Neapolitan Violinist.—Lady Prescott opened her beautiful saloons on Monday evening for the concert of this young artist. Mdlle de Bono played several new compositions, to the evident delight of her audience. The vocalists who "assisted" Mdlle de Bono were Mdlle Holmberg, Mrs Talbot Cherer, Signor Adelman, Signor Danieli, and Mr George Perren. The conductors were Herren Ganz and Lehmeyer.

REVIEWS.

Duff & Stewart.

I. Over the Mountain. Ballad. Words, by permission, from All the Year Round. Music by J. L. Hatton.

II. The Moon comes forth in Splendour. Song. Translated from the German of Giebel by Beatrice Abercrombie. Music composed by George Frederick Hatton.

We have put these works together because it is not often we have the privilege of so treating the productions of father and son. All idea of comparison must, of course, be dismissed, seeing that, howsoever able the son may be, his youth could have little chance against the recognized powers and great experience of the father. But we may say that the veteran has no reason to be ashamed of the recruit. Young Hatton writes, not only in the style, but with much of the fluency and skill of Hatton père; whose good name he will worthily represent in time to come. With regard to the songs before us, no more need be said than that they are very good ones, adapted for general use, and have our hearty commendation.

The performances of sacred music during Passion week, under Mr Barnby's direction, which have now become an established feature at the Royal Albert Hall, are to be given this year on Monday, Wednesday, Good Friday and Saturday next week. On the first three days Bach's Passion according to St Matthew will be performed, and the series will conclude, as usual, with the Messiah. The list of artists announced for the various performances includes Madame Lemmens-Sherrington, Madame Corani, Mdlle Johanna Levier, Madame Patey, Mr Sims Reeves, Mr Cummings, Mr Lloyd, Mr Thurley Beale, and Signor Foli. Mr Randegger and Dr Stainer will preside respectively at the pianoforte and organ, and the choruses and chorals will be sung by the members of the Royal Albert Hall Choral Society.

The Allmanyuka.

(From "Another World.")

"Improve Nature's gifts, and with her elements form new compounds . . . .

"Were man's faculties given that they should slumber?"

On examining the Allmanyuka (for so we called this fruit-vegetable, meaning that it combined every valuable quality), and observing its effects, the doctors pronounced it very wholesome, nutritious, and admirably suited to persons of dyspeptic habit, inasmuch as it dispelled all symptoms of flatulency and, by its tonic and digestive qualities, gave a feeling of lightness to the senses.

The people wondered, and were loud in their manifestations of gratitude, but my joy was greater than theirs; for I had accomplished a lasting good for the subjects I loved.

Accompanied by my harp, I sang praises, with all the fervour of my soul, to Him who had inspired me with the thought, and had endowed me with patience and strength for its consummation.

Fruits had often been increased in size, or improved in quality and productiveness, by grafting one tree upon another; but no new fruit had previously been created. There were instances where trees of different kinds, the one grafted on the other, had borne two kinds of fruit. This, however, was the first instance where other means, besides grafting, were employed, and an entirely new fruit had been brought into existence.

The Allmanyuka grows like a tree, and its stem is supported by sticks. The fruit, which hangs from its branches, is in shape, but in shape only, not unlike your vegetable-marrow, being covered with little circular divisions, each containing others still more minute. Its colour, when raw, is of the brightest violet, which through the culinary process becomes a beautiful red; though I should observe that the first compound vegetable in the seeds of which I inserted the spice particles was yellow.

It may not be uninteresting to know that the Allmanyuka is cooked in a vessel over steam. Indeed, everything with us is cooked by steam, this being especially serviceable, on account of the steadiness of its action. There are machines to regulate the force and action of the steam, and the attendant has only to obey mechanically the simplest instructions.

The Allmanyuka is used in some sick rooms as a fumigator. For this purpose it is cut into slices, and the exuded juice which it bleeds is accompanied with an aromatic odour.

The fruit possesses many other valuable properties. After its discovery my people were never more afflicted with the maladies for the prevention of which it had been created. It was sometimes called by the name given by me,—often by a term signifying, "Inspiration of the Father of the World." *

* Although it may appear incongruous to refer to a philosopher of this earth as illustrating the work of a philosopher of another planet, the Editor cannot help quoting a passage from a man possessed of wondrous prescience, who, to use his own words, "held up a lamp in the obscurity of philosophy that would be seen ages after he was dead." It will also in a measure convey the difference between the process of grafting and the course pursued by the Tootmanyoso in the creation of the Allmanyuka.

The inspired philosopher says: "The compounding or mixing of kinds in plants is not found out, which, nevertheless, if it be possible, is more at command than that of living creatures, for that their lust requireth a voluntary motion; wherefore it were one of the most noble experiments touching plants to find it out; for so you may have great variety of new fruits and flowers yet unknown. Grafting doth it not; it mendeth the fruit or doubleth the flowers, etc.; but it hath not the power to make a new kind. For the scion ever over-ruleth the stock."—Bacon's 'Sylva Sylvarum.'

PROVINCIAL.

MAIDSTONE.—The last of the winter course of the Literary and Mechanics' Institution entertainments has taken place. Sir Michael Costa's Eli was given by Mr Henniker's choir, to a large audience, in the Corn Exchange. Of the performance we cannot speak in terms of unqualified praise—writes the Maidstone and Kent County Standard. The soloists executed the task entrusted to them with credit; the band was also fairly up to its work, but the chorus was far from being what we could have desired. Miss Matilda Scott sang the music allotted to her with expression and care, the florid air, "I will extol Thee, O Lord," rousing the somewhat tame audience to enthusiasm, a repetition being necessitated. The contralto recitations and airs were entrusted to Miss A. Newton; the air, "Lord, from my bed," was redemanded. Mr W. Crowe was effective in the tenor music, while Messrs Rhodes and Christian were heard to advantage in the bass recitatives and airs. Mr Dutnall presided at the harmonium, and Mr Henniker conducted.

GLASGOW.—Il Talismano ("The Knight of the Leopard,") which attracted so much attention some months ago, was presented again last week. It was mounted with consummate art, as is usually the case when spectacular displays are placed upon the stage of the Theatre Royal. Mdlle Tietjens once more asserted her claim to rank as a queen of song, singing the music and acting the part with the truthfulness and energy to which we are accustomed. Signor Catalani, as Nectabanus, and Signor Galassi, as the "lion-hearted" King, were worthy of commendation. The finale to the third act, one of the best written numbers in the opera, was exceedingly well sung. Mdlle Risarelli was compelled to give the second verse of her chanson over again. The customary effect was produced by the martial sequel to the duet for soprano and tenor near the end of the third act, and Mdlle Tietjens and Signor Paladini were compelled to repeat the movement; and the well-known "Rose Song" received a fair measure of justice from Signor Paladini. The subordinate parts were sustained by Signori Rinaldini, Casaboni, and Costa.

BIRKENHEAD.—We read in the Liverpool Daily Post that the Birkenhead Musical Society gave a concert in the Queen's Hall, Claughton Road, Birkenhead, on Thursday evening, under the conductorship of Mr W. Ignatius Argent. The music consisted of Handel's Acis and Galatea, and a miscellaneous selection for the second part, and the forces comprised the amateur members of the society, who have been rehearsing all the winter, under Mr Argent's superintendence, and a band of some thirty-five performers. J. F. Barnett's Lay of the Last Minstrel, and one or two other pieces in the second part, were nicely played, and the tone of the band was good, but the accompaniments, especially to Handel's cantata, were rough and inaccurate to a degree which it is difficult to account for, unless from the utter absence of rehearsal. The chorus appeared to know their work, and sang with considerable spirit. The solos were assigned to Mrs Billinie Porter, Messrs C. Wilson, J. Trainor, and Signor Olano (the last named taking the place of Mr Alfred Brown, who was unable to attend). Mr Wilson's singing of "Love in her eyes," and "Love sounds the alarm," more especially the latter, was very nice.

DUBLIN.—Professor Glover's oratorio, St Patrick at Tara, was given with great success in the large concert-hall of the Exhibition Palace The Lord Mayor and Lady Mayoress, with a large and fashionable audience, were present. The oratorio was given for the first time in its "entirety," and formed one of the greatest musical successes of the season. There was a find band, led by Mr R. M. Levey, supplemented by a military band. Mr Horan presided at the organ, and Mrs Mackey played the obbligato accompaniments for the harp. The principal vocalists were Miss Bessie Craig, Miss Taylor, Mr Barton M'Guckin, Mr Grattan Kelly, Mr R. Smith, and Mr Williams, members of the Dublin Glee and Madrigal Union, who were all in excellent voice, and executed the parts allotted to them con amore. The choruses throughout were sung capitally, and the orchestral organ and harp accompaniments were equally effective. Professor Glover may be congratulated on the success of the performance, and it is to be hoped that before long we may have another opportunity of hearing a composition so full of merit from beginning to end.—Sir Robert P. Stewart delivered the first of his series of lectures upon keyed instruments of music, in the examination hall of Trinity College, which was filled with the élite of Dublin, who evidently heartily enjoyed one of the most interesting lectures ever given by Sir Robert Stewart, which want of space prevents our giving here. The illustrations on the pianoforte, zither, and Indian dulcimer, pleased excessively. A young lady, pupil of Dr F. Hiller, of Cologne, was the pianist, and delighted everyone. The zither is quite a novelty in Dublin.

STETTIN.—The members of the Stettin Vocal Association have given König Otto, a "lay-oratorio" by their director, Dr Lorenz. The interest of the work is centred in the choruses.

MAD. CHRISTINE NILSSON'S FRENCH TOUR.

Mad. Nilsson continues her successful career. After singing at Rouen, she proceeded to Nantes, where her reception was no less cordial. The local press are loud in her praise. We may take as a specimen some observations by M. Evariste Mangin, in the Phare de la Loire :—

"Nearly all the numbered places were taken beforehand. In order to reserve a few for late comers on the night of the concert itself, it was necessary to stop the sale of tickets in the forenoon of the previous day. When the performance began there was not a vacant space. . . . Had the eminent artist been informed that she was about to sing before three thousand persons? We cannot say, but we felt convinced that she suspected it as soon as she appeared. Every glass was directed towards her. 'That is she! There she is!' Jules Janin would have said. Yes, it was, indeed, Christine Nilsson, tall and blonde, with features suited for the photographer and the sculptor, and with physiognomy alike expressive and mobile. There is certainly something strange and sympathetic about her."

After describing her dress, and the jewels she wore, M. Mangin goes on :—

"But she had pearls in her throat also — the essential point; and the audience perceived, in the first notes of the air from La Traviata, that she was decidedly in the fullest possession of her admirable vocal powers."

Twice recalled, Mad. Nilsson volunteered a piece not set down in the programme—Mignon's Romance—followed by loud and enduring plaudits. She next sang something in quite a different style—M. Gounod's "Ave Maria"—with breadth of style, amplitude of tone, and true religious fervour.

After the air from Lucia, the great artist gave two of those Swedish melodies with which her admirers are so well acquainted. Alluding to these, M. Mangin observes :—

"This fair Swede, though adopted by France, loves her cold native land, and the melodies which, perhaps, she once sang under the blue vault of heaven. These she adorns with an exceptional charm; and if it be true that she has to thank them for her first success, she has amply paid the debt."

In reply to a hint that she preferred to sing in opera, Mad. Nilsson was informed that next winter her wish might be gratified, as at that epoch there would be an operatic company at Nantes, with chorus and orchestra complete.

From the banks of the Loire to the country watered by the Garonne is but a short distance. We next find Mad. Nilsson at Bordeaux, where she appeared at the principal theatre.

"The whole evening"—says a writer in La Province—"was one series of ovations. Scarcely had she commenced the andante from La Traviata, which she gives with such charm and truth of expression, than the enthusiasm knew no bounds. After the finale, the audience seemed as though they would never tire of recalling her. In reply to this warm reception, Mad. Nilsson gave the romance from Mignon. . . . . In Gounod's "Ave Maria" she was unanimously encored, and gracefully acceded to the wish of her admiring audience."

The writers in the Loire and the Journal de Bordeaux are equally lavish in their praises. According to the latter, on the morning of the concert, 18,000 francs had been taken at the box office, while in the course of the day the price of a stall went up to 75 francs. "Nilsson," winds up the eloquent critic, "surpassed herself"—which is saying no little.

Boston (America)—Feb. 17.—The first appearance this season of Miss Clara Louise Kellogg, in The Bohemian Girl, filled the Globe Theatre to its utmost capacity last evening. An apology was made for Miss Kellogg, and the statement made that she was suffering from fatigue. Nevertheless, the purity of her voice was not seriously marred by the hoarseness under which she laboured. Mr Maas was Thaddeus, and sang with marked refinement. Mr Maas's voice has gained in richness and in sympathetic qualities since he was last here. Mr Carleton was Count Arnheim; Mr Peakes, Devilshoof; Mr Morgan, Florestein; and Miss Flora Davidson made her first appearance here as the Gipsy Queen. This evening, Ambroise Thomas's Mignon will be given here for the first time in English, with the following cast:—Mignon, Miss Kellogg; Filina, Mrs Van Zandt; Frederic, Miss Beaumont; Lothario, Mr Peakes; Laertes, Mr Morgan; Giarno, Mr Cayla; Antonio, Mr Howard; and Wilhelm, Mr Castle.

THE LUTE AND THE MANDOLINE,

With some Remarks on Sig. Giovanni Vailati in connection with them.*

Those learned in musical archæology and organography assure us that the Mandoline is the son of the Cither and the nephew of the Lute; the said instrument (still according to the learned in such matters) comes from the eoud of the Arabs, which the Turks called laouthah; the Spaniards, laoudo; the Provençals, laut and lahut; the Italians, lauto, leuto, and liuto; and the French, leut and luth. From luth, the French have formed luthier, a word still signifying a maker of stringed musical instruments.

Some persons, however, think the word liuto may very well come from the Latin lituus, the fact of the lituus being a wind instrument, neither more nor less than a trumpet, presenting, according to them, no difficulty, because among the stringed instruments employed in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries there was one called the marine trumpet.

From the commencement of the sixteenth, down to the end of the first half of the eighteenth, century, the lute was the most widely spread of all musical instruments in Europe. As is the case with the piano at the present day, it was the instrument of every one. The oldest lutists of whom we know anything were two Italians: Francesco Spinaccio and Ambrogio Bala of Milan.

Among the performers of extraordinary skill we may mention: Alberto of Milan; Alberto of Mantua; Annibale of Padua; the composer, Alessandro Striggio; Davide Rizzio; Prince Filippo Caraffa; Marc' Antonio Pordenone, nephew of the celebrated painter; Maudit; Monbuisson; Heckell; Reussner; Strobel; etc., etc. It would appear, however, that the most skilful of all, the Paganini of the Lute, so to speak, was Leopold Weiss, born at Breslau in 1680. He challenged organists to play fugues with him, and was unrivalled as an extemporiser. He was, also, highly esteemed as a composer. The lute was the favourite instrument of Edward IV. of England, of Mary Tudor, of Francis I., of Mary Stuart, etc.

From the lute came the arch-lute, larger in size and furnished with a greater number of strings; the theorbe, an instrument invented by the Florentine, Bardella, and preferred by Caccini to any other instrument for accompanying vocal pieces; the theorbina, for which Kapsberger composed some very beautiful things; the pandora, with metal chords; the cittern, the mandoline, and the colachon, or Italian lute.

In the musical art of our ancestors, all these instruments were of great importance, being preferred to any others for executing chamber music, and especially for accompanying madrigals, "vilanelles," dancing and drinking songs. During the whole of the seventeenth century, lutes, arch-lutes, or great lutes, and theorbes formed component parts of orchestras in the theatre as well as the church. But, little by little, they fell into disuse. They disappeared to make way for violins and violoncellos, and now, of all the above family of instruments, the only ones left alive (if alive they can be called) are the mandoline and the colachon.

During a certain period, the mandoline was distinguished as the Neapolitan and the Milanese. The Neapolitan had four strings, on the same system as the violin. The Milanese had five or even six, generally tuned thus: G, B, E, A, D, G. The chords of the mandoline were of copper or steel, sometimes twisted and sometimes not. With the occasional exception of the treble chord, they are always double, but tuned in unison. The chords are sounded with a sort of plectrum, called in Italian a penno.

There have been performers on the mandoline who have left a celebrated name in the annals of art. Among these may be mentioned Felix Hungersburgh a captain of Charles V.'s. Durero, in his Travels in Holland, speaks of him as a wonder; and Fridzeri, about whom, both as a man and a musician, a few lines will not be thrown away.

Alessandro Fridzeri was born at Rome, the 16th January, 1741. When a year old, he was attacked by the small pox, and entirely lost his sight in consequence. But, while still a boy, he showed that he had received from Nature a most rare mind, and was gifted with extraordinary aptitude for mechanics and music. At the age of nine, he was a good violinist; at the age of eleven, he made himself a mandoline; this became eventually his favourite instrument, and he achieved singular proficiency on it. At the age of eighteen he was an admirable organist. As a performer on the mandoline he was highly praised and applauded in the principal cities of Germany, Belgium, and France. At Strassburgh, he determined to make an essay on the stage, and wrote a one-act comic opera entitled Les deux Miliciens, which was very successful; the melody was spontaneous, elegant, and completely Italian; the harmony simple, but treated with a sure hand and good taste; the instrumentation, lively; and the whole full of a feeling for the stage. In Paris, he conceived and carried out a most ingenious typographic table, to render the process of writing music possible and easy for the blind. With this, he afterwards wrote, in a very short space of time, two other operas: Les Souliers mordorés, and Lucette, of which the former only was favourably received. He then resumed his mandoline and his life of a concert-giver. He founded at Nantes a Philharmonic Academy; but the terrible dramas of the war in La Vendée obliged him to abandon that city and fly to Paris. In Paris, he established another Philharmonic Academy in the Magazines of the Opera, as they were called, but he was doomed to be perpetually the butt of misfortune. The Magazines fell a prey to the flames, in consequence of the explosion of the Infernal Machine, December 3rd, 1801, and poor Fridzeri was left with nothing in the world. Though advanced in age, he again betook himself to travelling about, giving concerts. At last, he fixed himself at Antwerp, where his lessons furnished him with the means of a quiet existence. He died in 1819, leaving unfinished the manuscript of another opera: Le Termopile.

At the commencement of the present century, Pietro Vimercati enjoyed the reputation of being a most accomplished mandoline-player. He died at a good old age at Genoa, in 1850.

And now we have Giovanni Vailati, who is equally accomplished and, like Vimercati, designated the Paganini of the Mandoline.

Giovanni Vailati, unless we are incorrectly informed, was born at Santa Maria della Croce, near Crema, about 1815.

The son, as he was, of a poor family, and blind, he would have passed a wretched life, had Providence not caused him to meet with a good-hearted man and excellent musician, Pietro Bottesini, father of the celebrated double-bass player. Bottesini gave him musical instruction, and enriched his memory with a large number of musical compositions. For Vailati, the mandoline no longer presents any difficulties. As an executant, he is always sure and always most correct. In runs and variations, on the fifth string, he excites the wonder of everyone. But he prefers plain melody, and in this there are really very few instrumentalists like him. His mode of phrasing is all feeling and soul; every accent is full of life and passion. In a word, Vailati is an artist.

The Gazetta Musicale of Milan wrote, some years ago, as follows: Bellini is the favourite composer of the Blind Musician of Crema; in fact, he causes his mandoline literally to sing the moving melodies from Norma, Beatrice, and La Sonnambula.

This sympathy for Bellini does not, however, prevent Vailati from esteeming and admiring all the great men who have shed lustre on musical Italy. We heard him relate, in his simple language, and with manifest emotion, how, being at Busseto, the native place of Verdi, and, giving a concert there, he was indescribably mortified and grieved that the celebrated composer was not present, but simply sent his excuses and a sum of money. Vailati sent back word that he was extremely grateful, but, at the same time, begged his messenger to state that the presence of such a composer would have been far more highly prized by him, and far more flattering to his self-love than any gift of money. At his second concert, his desire was gratified. Verdi came. He heard him, warmly applauded him, and, begging the gentleman who accompanied to get up, himself took his place.

Vailati, like all men of merit, is most modest; hence, at Florence, his concerts passed off nearly un-noticed. All, however, who heard him at the Pagliano, or at the Alfieri, applauded him heartily, and all with one voice pronounced him to be a performer of really singular merit, and worthy of the reputation which has caused him to be called the Paganini of the mandoline.

WAIFS.

Mdme Arabella Goddard has already given three concerts at San Francisco, with brilliant success. Three more are announced. Mdme Goddard will not go to New York till October next.

Signor Foli has arrived in London, from Moscow.

Spring song (to the trees)—"How can I leaf thee?"

"Sourrilous pamphlet" is what the American Israelite calls Wagner's "Judaism in Music."

M. Diaz de Soria has been winning great honours at Marseilles and Bourdeaux. He will soon arrive in London for the season.

Gruff door-tenders and unaccommodating ushers do more harm to a place of amusement than the worst kind of stormy weather.

The police of Paris have absolutely forbidden smoking within the walls of theatres—not a useless, nor, in England, a novel precaution.

It is said that Manager Strakosch lost $75,000 during the season of Italian opera so abruptly brought to a close by the flitting of Albani.

Mr W. G. Cusins has been appointed Professor of Instrumental Music at Queen's College, a position held by the late Sir Sterndale Bennett.

Rubinstein is said to play thirty or forty pieces at each of his Berlin recitals. "Quel estomac, ces Prussiens," exclaims a wondering Frenchman.

A musical festival for Schleswig-Holstein is fixed to take place at Kiel on the fourth and fifth of July, under the direction of Herr Joachim.

The fête given at the New Opera for the poor of Paris brought in 72,822 francs, which sum M. Halanzier has forwarded to Madame MacMahon.

It is troubling the impressarii just now to find a system of mathematics, by which a salary of $2,000 per night can be deducted from $1,900 receipts, and leave a balance sufficient to pay travelling expenses.

Mr Ch. J. Bishenden, we are informed, has been awarded the first prize by the New York (America) Society of Arts, for his paper on "Vocal Studies."

Miss Julia Wigan, the clever pupil of Madame Sainton-Doby, made a successful appearance at the Albert Hall on Tuesday night, when she sang three Irish songs.

Miss Edwards, the esteemed pianist and composer, has returned to London, after visiting Rome, Milan, and Venice, where her musical acquirements were highly appreciated.

M. Achard will assist Madame Nilsson during her short season in Brussels. "Toute la Belgique," writes the enthusiastic Ménestrel, "s'inscrit au Théâtre Royal de la Monnaie."

It is dawning upon the minds of the impressarii that singers at from one to two thousand dollars a night are too costly to carry around the country during a season of reflection and common-sense.

A clergyman has discovered that Bishop Heber's familiar hymn,

"By cool Siloam's shady rill
How sweet the lily grows," is a topographical and botanic falsehood. No shady rill is there, and no lily grows in its neighbourhood!

Miss Gwilt, whose personation of Amaranthe, in La Fille de Mdme Angot, has been the "talk" of the provinces, is now winning eulogies from the northern press by her capital acting, as Mrs Cregan, in The Colleen Bawn; Mrs Willoughby, in The Ticket of Leave Man; and Cornelia Carlyle, in East Lynn.

Miss Emily Tate, the youthful pianist, made her début at the Crystal Palace Concert on Monday last, "and"—a correspondent writes us word—"was warmly received, and called forward at the conclusion of her performance." With persevering study, this young artist will in time make a name in her profession, for she possesses undoubted talent.

Mendelssohn's St Paul was the oratorio announced for last night by the Sacred Harmonic Society. This great work, now in its fortieth year, is gaining wider and wider acceptance. That the directors of the Albert Hall Concerts are not unmindful of Passion Week may be gathered from the fact that performances of Bach's sublime St Matthew are promised for Monday, Wednesday, and Friday, with Handel's Messiah on Saturday, as a worthy climax.

Ferdinand Hiller's Symphony in E minor (Op. 67), with the motto, "Still the spring must come," was played at the Sixth Peabody Concert, at Baltimore, on Feb. 6. A local journal, The Sun, writes:—This work is filled with fine poetic thoughts; and some of the movements, especially the scherzo, are exceedingly beautiful. It was received with great applause. At the same concert, Mr R. Hoffmann, of New York, played Mozart's Pianoforte Concerto in D minor, and was received in the most flattering manner, and the fourth act of an opera (by the conductor, Mr Asger Hamerik), entitled Tovelille, and Berlioz's "Hungarian March," were given. The vocalist was Miss Emma Thursby, of New York, who sang the grand air in the first act of Mozart's Il Flauto Magico, and an air with variations by Proch.

The Hamlet of M. Ambroise Thomas, with Mdme Miolan-Carvalho, vice Mdme Nilsson, as Ophelia, will shortly add variety to the attractions at the New Grand Opera, which has been trading too persistently upon Guillaume Tell, La Favorite, and La Juive. The part of Hamlet will devolve upon M. Faure, its original representative at the late theatre in the Rue Lepelletier.

The committee of the forthcoming Cincinnati May Musical Festival has decided that the following works and selections shall be performed:—Triumphal Hymn, Brahms; Symphony (Op. 92) in A, Beethoven; Prometheus, Liszt; Elijah, Mendelssohn; Magnificat in D, Bach; Ninth Symphony, Beethoven; Symphony in C, Schubert; Lohengrin, Wagner; and a number of smaller pieces of great merit and interest, by various composers.

The poor lunatic who asked an artist, while painting a cow, "why he didn't paint her voice," was not so far out of the way after all. A new scientific achievement has been reached through the joint efforts of Prof. I. Graham Bell and Dr Blake, of Boston; and though not yet perfected, marks an advance in science. Recently, at the Essex Institute, Salem, Prof. Bell, assisted by Rev. E. C. Bolles, "displayed upon a large camera the very air ripples or sound waves produced in sounding various words and letters as registered upon a glass surface treated with a coating of lamp-black, by means of a pencil operated by the reverberating ear drum. . . . The sound wave was also shown, as proceeding from the living mouth, by articulating in a speaking-tube, the end of which was in proximity to a gas flame, which, through a drum-head membrane, was set in vibration by the sound uttered. This flame being reflected upon a mirror, exhibited features characteristic of each succeeding sound.

There is scarcely a substance in Nature out of which some kind of music has not been evoked. Metals, wood, air, water, have all, through the agency of human intelligence, been made subservient to musical tones. Even stones and hills of sand, we are told by travellers, have been known to emit sounds resembling an instrument being played at a distance. Thus, we see Nature, unassisted by art or ingenuity, furnishes for us music—sometimes grand and awful, again soft, soothing, until at last it hushes into silence. Even in silence there is a kind of music, as every musician well understands. And in every composition do we not see Nature's music mirrored? There is the rush of the torrent in grand crescendos, the moaning and shrieking of the winds, the dashing of the pelting rain, then the gradual dying away of the storm in graceful diminuendos, until all is hushed to silence. Then comes the rest. We all know the beautiful effect of the rest in music, which is the symbol of the music of silence. There is majesty in absolute silence, often grand, awe-inspiring, more than is produced by the loftiest strains or richest harmonies. When we are told by the writer of the Revelations that there was silence in heaven for the space of half-an-hour, what a magnificent idea it conjures up in the mind! Thousands of thousands and tens of thousands of bright and glorious angels, who swell the choir of heaven, lay down their harps with one accord for the sublime rest in the mighty song.—Musical Visitor.

The death was announced on Wednesday morning of Mr Richard Limpus, organist and director of the choir at St Michael's, Cornhill, and honorary secretary and founder of the College of Organists. Mr Limpus, who died on Monday, at the early age of fifty, was a brother of the Rev. H. F. Limpus, vicar of Twickenham, who is also well known as a musician of considerable attainments. Mr Limpus, from his early training and long practice, had obtained a high reputation as a choirmaster no less than as an organist, and the choral services at St Michael's had, under his direction, became known for their excellence. It was, however, as the founder of the College of Organists that Mr Limpus had acquired his reputation among his professional brethren, and his death will be a great loss to the institution, to the interests of which he had devoted himself with the utmost earnestness. The arrangements for the festival service in aid of the College Benevolent Fund, held at St Paul's Cathedral a few months since, were made by Mr Limpus; but shortly after, his health began to fail, and his illness, which was largely due to overwork, has now terminated fatally. In the direction of musical societies in London and the suburbs, Mr Limpus was largely engaged, and he was also an effective vocalist. Mr Limpus had published several sacred works and songs. In his private life Mr Limpus was distinguished by great geniality and benevolence. The post of organist at St Michael's is one of the most valuable appointments of its kind in the city of London.

LEIPSIC.—Kiel's oratorio, Christus, has been performed with success in St Thomas's by the Riedel Association.

MAGDEBURG.—The members of Rebling's Association display laudable activity. Not long since they gave Brahms' Requiem, and Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, with Mdlle Breidenstein as solo vocalist, and now they announce Bach's Matthäus-Passion for Palm Sunday. Mdlle Breidenstein has been appointed chamber-singer to Prince Günther II. of Schwarzburg-Sonderhausen.

"The remarkable qualities of this book are the author's freedom from conventional trammels, the strong sense of his opinions, and the novelty yet evident soundness of his precepts; his work has consequently come into general use as a manual of vocal instruction."—Daily News.

DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE,

For invigorating and enriching the voice, and removing affections of the throat.

DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE is universally acknowledged to be the most valuable remedy for sore throat, hoarseness and relaxed throat. It should always be taken before singing or reciting, as it strengthens the vocal organs. It is most extensively prescribed by the faculty for the throat and voice. Dr Lewis of Basingstoke says he finds them most efficacious, and in Dr Copland's Dictionary of Practical Medicine (Longman & Co.), they are strongly recommended at pages 872 and 1492. They are used by all the greatest vocalists and orators in Europe, and have been established over a quarter of a century. Testimonials from Patti, Grisi, Lablache, Santley, &c. Sold in boxes, 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. by all Chemists throughout the United Kingdom and the Colonies.

ARTHUR SULLIVAN'S NEW SONG,
"THOU ART WEARY,"
WORDS BY ADELAIDE PROCTOR.
MUSIC BY ARTHUR SULLIVAN.
SUNG BY
MISS ANTOINETTE STERLING
AT THE
MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

"The singer was Miss Antoinette Sterling, who, always heartily admired in those German ballads, for which she exhibits so marked a sympathy, introduced in a group four of Schumann's most graceful contributions to the Lieder repertory, and, later in the evening, a new song by Mr Arthur Sullivan, 'Thou art weary' (set to words by Adelaide Proctor)—one of the most charming recent emanations from the pen of our gifted compatriot."—The Times, Nov. 10.

"Miss Sterling was the vocalist, and sang, in addition to selections from Schumann, a new song by Arthur Sullivan, entitled, 'Thou art weary,' which is one of the most beautiful and thoughtful effusions of the composer's graceful music."—Daily Telegraph, Nov. 12.

"Miss Antoinette Sterling was the vocalist. In the second part she introduced a new song by Mr Sullivan, an admirable setting for a contralto voice of some very touching lines by the late Miss Adelaide Proctor, addressed by a poor mother to her starving child, the burden being—

'Sleep, my darling, thou art weary;
God is good, but life is dreary.'

The song exactly suited Miss Sterling's voice and style, and it will assuredly become as great a favourite as 'Will he come,' to which it is a worthy pendant, and the words of which are also by Miss Proctor."—Standard, Nov. 12.

"Miss Antoinette Sterling repeated Mr Sullivan's new song, 'Thou art weary,' a second hearing of which has confirmed our good opinion of it."—Standard, Nov. 16.

"At the concert on Monday, Miss Sterling had introduced a series of charming Lieder by Schumann, and a new song by Mr Arthur Sullivan, 'Sleep, my darling, thou art weary,' an admirable setting of Miss Proctor's poem, 'Hush, I cannot bear to see thee,' which, like everything Miss Proctor wrote, was well adapted for, and, in fact, seemed to invite musical treatment. Her verses have inspired Mr Sullivan with a genuine melody, of which the refrain is particularly remarkable; and the song, both at Monday's and Saturday's concert, pleased so much that Miss Sterling was called upon to repeat it."—Pall Mall Gazette, Nov. 17.

"Miss Sterling sang discreetly and sympathetically four of Schumann's 'Dichterliebe' (Nos. 1, 2, 7, and 8); but came off still better in a new song by Mr A. Sullivan, who has set words by Adelaide Proctor, 'Thou art weary,' the dying consolation of a starved mother to her child, the refrain of which is—

'Sleep, my darling, thou art weary;
God is good, but life is dreary.'

It is a painful theme; but the composer has treated it with such pathos that the air tells powerfully."—Athenæum, Nov. 14.

"The vocalist was Miss Sterling, who sang four songs by Schumann (Nos. 1, 2, 7, and 8 of the 'Dichterliebe'), and a new song, entitled 'Thou art weary,' written by Miss Adelaide Proctor. The words are good, and have been fitted to charming and expressive music by Mr Arthur Sullivan, who has added a pianoforte accompaniment worthy his high reputation, and worth listening to for its own sake."—Observer, Nov. 15.

Published in the keys of D minor and F minor, Price 4s.

ARTHUR SULLIVAN'S NEW SONG,
"TENDER AND TRUE,"
SUNG BY
MISS EDITH WYNNE
AT THE
MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS, ST JAMES'S HALL.

"The vocalist was Miss Edith Wynne, who sang a new song, 'Tender and True,' by Arthur Sullivan, the beauty of which, aided by a most tasteful rendering, elicited an encore."—Daily Telegraph, January 13.

"Mr Sullivan's graceful song—a novelty—was rendered by Miss Edith Wynne with much refined expression; and the applause which followed necessitated its entire repetition."—Daily News, January 13.

"A very expressive new song, by Mr A. Sullivan, 'Tender and True,' was sung with such effect by Miss Edith Wynne that it had to be repeated."—Illustrated London News, January 16.

"Miss Edith Wynne, who gave, in her own genuine and expressive manner, a graceful new song, 'Tender and True,' by Mr Arthur Sullivan, which was encored, and repeated."—Graphic, January 16.

Published in the keys of E flat and F, Price 4s.

A peine ai-je vu le printemps
Couvrir dix fois de leur feuillage
Les vieux saules de nos étangs,
Que, sans pitié pour mon jeune âge,
Dieu m'a ravi le guide aimé
Qui me prodiguait ses tendresses!
Je pleure son regard charmé!
Je ne reçois plus ses caresses!

Ainsi parlait, en gémissant,
Une orpheline désolée;
Mais un bel ange, l'embrassant,
Lui dit, d'une voix inspirée:
"Ne pleure plus et sois ma sœur
Ma mère sera notre mère,
Et tu verras que du bonheur
Il en est encor sur la terre!"

SATURDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

The Saturday afternoon concerts in St James's Hall, originally an offshoot from the Monday evening entertainments, long firmly established, are now inseparable from the parent institution. Their immediate object was the convenience of amateurs residing in the suburbs—many, indeed in the country—to whom a journey late at night, even after a rich musical treat, was a heavy task, and occasionally one of no small difficulty. They have, moreover, proved of inestimable benefit to schools where "early to bed and early to rise" is an indispensable rule, affording opportunities for lessons by example hardly to be obtained elsewhere, lessons which nothing in the shape of precept could endow with the persuasive force calculated to promote emulation and kindle a desire for study and improvement. The success of the Saturday Popular Concerts has been commensurate with the excellent intentions that led to their establishment. The same artists who appear on Monday evenings appear also on Saturday afternoons, the only difference being that on Saturdays, for evident reasons, the programmes are somewhat shorter.

The afternoon concert of the day before yesterday was as favourable a specimen of its kind as could be wished. Being the last for the present season, the selection was more varied than on ordinary occasions, and thus, inevitably, somewhat longer than usual. No one complained, however, of a programme so attractive as the one of which we subjoin a brief outline :—

Quartet, in C major, Op. 76, No. 3 (strings) ...	Haydn.
Song, "Tre giorni son che Nina"	Pergolesi.
Capriccio, in E major, Op. 33 (pianoforte) ...	Mendelssohn.
Ritornello, Siciliana, and Gavotte (violoncello)	Veracini and Geminiani.
Song, "O, swallow, swallow"	Piatti.
Polonaise, in C major, Op. 89 (pianoforte) ...	Beethoven.
Trio, in B flat, Op. 37 (pianoforte and strings)	Beethoven.
Song, "The Erl King"	Schubert.
Introduction and Polonaise Brillante (pianoforte and violoncello)	Chopin.

The hall was crowded; and among the audience was her Royal Highness the Princess of Wales, who has frequently honoured these Saturday "afternoons" with her presence. The performance from first to last more than carried out expectation. That Haydn's quartet—at one time one of the most popular, if not absolutely the most popular, in the unprecedentedly large catalogue of such works contributed to art by the famous old master—was perfectly executed by MM. Joachim, L. Ries, Straus, and Piatti, may be taken for granted. The early vogue of this quartet, it is affirmed, was mainly attributable to the graceful and ingenious variations upon the Austrian National Hymn, "God save the Emperor," forming the second movement. This is probably true; but just as in the case of the "Surprise" Symphony, which earned both title and popularity from a movement similarly contrived, the quartet in C has much more to say for itself, each movement, the finale especially, deserving close attention. The next instrumental piece—second of three "capriccios" composed at different periods by Mendelssohn, but published in a series dedicated to his intimate friend, Karl Klingemann—is the one preferred by Schumann, who said that it carried the initials, "F. M. B." on every page, comparing it further on (Gesammelte Schriften) with "one of Walt's summer flights into the country in Jean Paul Richter's Flegel Jahre." This "capriccio" has always been a favourite with Mr Charles Hallé; and nobody gives it with greater delicacy and finesse. It is precisely suited to the refined style and accurate manipulation invariably distinguishing this gentleman's playing. The three pieces for violoncello—two by Veracini (from a sonata) and one by Geminiani—exhibited Signor Piatti in his very best mood as an exponent of the old Italian masters. Veracini and Geminiani—the latter contemporary of Corelli, with whom he studied, the former contemporary and rival of Tartini—were among the greatest violinists of a country which, later, gave birth to Viotti and Paganini. It is more than probable that the three movements executed with such consummate taste and skill on Saturday were originally composed for violin; they suit the violoncello, however, just as well, and, with the pianoforte accompaniment added by Signor Piatti himself (entrusted to Mr Hallé), are remarkably effective. The audience shared this opinion, as might be easily gathered from the applause elicited by the great artist who has held the post of leading violoncello, with rare intermission, ever since the 14th of February, 1859, when the first of the "Popular Concerts" was given by Mr S. Arthur Chappell, their originator and still indefatigable director. There was another pianist on this special occasion—Mdlle Marie Krebs, who is taking firmer and firmer hold on the public. At this no one who has watched her career can feel surprised. The repertory of Mdlle Krebs seems to be unlimited, and her memory never fails. The piece chosen for her solo display on Saturday—a Polonaise composed by Beethoven in 1814, dedicated to the Empress of Russia—had not been introduced before at the "Popular Concerts;" but, if we may judge by the cordial manner in which it was welcomed, it is likely to be heard of very soon again. It was rendered with a vigour and rhythmical precision which the composer himself would have approved; but, despite no less than three calls to the platform, Mdlle Krebs had the good sense respectfully to decline the "encore." She doubtless bore in mind that the greatest and longest of Beethoven's six trios for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello was to come immediately after; and for such artistic self-denial she merits high commendation. The trio—among the most famous tributes paid by the illustrious composer to his friend and patron, Archduke Rodolphe—was, in fact, the conspicuous feature of the programme. Here is one of those inspired pieces in which, by the agency of some potent charm of which he alone has the secret, Beethoven can make people travel with him for an indefinite period, and leave them at the end of his story, not, like the unwilling guest in the Ancient Mariner, wearied, listless, and down-hearted, but the livelier and happier for what they have heard. To signal out only one of the four movements—who could ever feel tired of those fanciful variations on one of the most expressive and melodious of themes? The breaking off, unexpectedly, through a sudden transition, leading to the finale, in another key, however disappointing to the majority of listeners who would like to hear more and more of the same strain, is a true stroke of genius. No composer ever knew better when he had developed a melody to its fullest extent than Beethoven. How the B flat trio was performed, after stating that the executants were Hallé, Joachim, and Piatti, may be left to the imagination. Better interpreted it could not possibly have been. The brilliant Polonaise of Chopin, with its short introduction (last instrumental "number" in the programme), was confided to Mdlle Krebs and Signor Piatti—competent hands, it need scarcely be added. Some might have felt disposed to complain that the same programme comprised two Polonaises in the same key; but, as there is very little in common—the mere rhythmical turn allowed for—between the Polonaise of Beethoven and that of Chopin, there was less cause to grumble. Only one singer took part in this concert; but that singer was Mr Santley, a host in himself. In an air by Pergolesi, Signor Piatti's charming song, "O, Swallow, Swallow" (with violoncello obbligato by the composer), and Schubert's "Erl King," Mr Santley, not for the first time by many, showed himself a practised adept in three wholly different styles, delighting the audience in each. The accompanist at the piano was Sir Julius Benedict. Her Royal Highness the Princess of Wales remained to the very end of the performance.

On Monday evening, the "Director's Night," when Herr Joachim, Herr Straus, Signor Piatti, Madame Norman-Néruda, Mdlle Marie Krebs, Dr Hans von Bülow, Mr Charles Hallé, and other artists appeared, brought the 17th season and 517th "Popular Concert" to an end, with one of J. S. Bach's concertos for three pianofortes, in which the above-mentioned pianists took part, Herr Joachim leading the orchestral accompaniments. More of this in our next.

VIENNA.—Cagliostro in Wien, the last operetta from the pen of Herr Johann Strauss, has been successfully produced at the Theater an der Wien, with Mdlle Geistinger in the principal female character.

IN MEMORY OF A GERMAN COMPOSER.*

It was 25 years, a few weeks ago, namely on the 14th December, 1874, since Conradin Kreutzer, the composer, died at Riga, far from the land of his birth. In his day he was one of the most celebrated men in Germany, and one of her most highly esteemed artists; and he is still, on account of the genuine nationality of his compositions, a favourite with Germans. At a time when no vocal festival took place, nay, when hardly a choral performance was given, at which his songs did not constitute the principal attraction of the programme, the famous composer was passing the last years of his life at Riga in quiet retirement and modest, or almost necessitous, circumstances. People in other lands sang and exulted in his splendid melodies, without knowing where the composer of them was, or how he was situated.

It was in the autumn of the year 1848 that Kreutzer went to Riga, without any of the public there having the slightest notion that he was coming. His arrival was first made more generally known one evening, during an operatic performance at the theatre, by a unanimous movement among the members of the orchestra, who kept looking at one of the boxes. The object of their curiosity was the famous composer, who had not long arrived, and who had visited the Town Theatre for the first time.

It is to his modesty, and, also, to the secret pride combined with it, that we must attribute the fact that, at Riga, as well as at other places where he previously resided, he was, up to the last, in what may be called straitened circumstances, without anyone's having an opportunity of rendering his existence more easy. In his unpretentiousness, in his horror of everything approaching, in the remotest degree, puffery, he bore a strong resemblance to Franz Schubert.

He did not go to the northern city, as incorrectly asserted in nearly all the biographical notices respecting him, in consequence of his engagement as a conductor. He went there with his daughter who was engaged at the Town Theatre, and, though enjoying a fair reputation abroad, was still his pupil. He wanted to make her what he considered as perfect and ideal a vocalist as possible. It was one of his many bitter disappointments that her voice soon lost its beauty. Already incapable of regular and severe exertion, Kreutzer lived with his wife and daughter on the latter's salary and the little he gained by giving singing lessons. On one occasion only did he appear as conductor at Riga, and this was in the theatre on the 16th February, 1849, when Das Nachtlager in Granada was performed for his daughter's benefit. With this exceptional direction of his own opera, his career as a conductor terminated for ever. The public took advantage of the occasion especially to distinguish so famous a composer. He was overwhelmed with all possible demonstrations of approbation and respect. His career as a composer ended, like Lortzing's, to which it bears a strong resemblance, with a song in couplets: "Mädchen und Blumen." He composed it for Herr Butterweck, with whom he was on friendly terms, and who was then engaged at the Riga Theatre as low comedian. Herr Butterweck, himself the author of the words, introduced and sang the song in the comic picture of popular life entitled, Der Unbedeutende. It was subsequently published. It bears the character of an unpretending occasional piece, and exhibits no trace of Kreutzer's once rich melody.

Partly no doubt from the weakness of age, and partly from the oppressive feeling that he was no longer capable of intellectual productivity he had, even before he went to Riga, fallen a prey to apathy, which rendered him quite different to what he had once been, artistically and socially. From this feeling he recovered only momentarily now and then. Although he was of not more than middling height, there had always been, a few years previously, something imposing about his appearance. His bearing had been stately and erect, and the expression of his countenance, its mildness notwithstanding, clear, decided, and ingenuous. All this was now changed. His bodily vigour had almost degenerated into corpulency, in which, without doubt, lay the cause of his death, the germ of the apoplectic stroke which carried him off the following year. Good music, or animated conversation respecting it, would sometimes make the old flame of his enthusiasm for art blaze up again, like fire from dying embers. This was, for instance, the case at the vocal meetings of the Riga Liedertafel, and at the musical parties got up by art-loving private persons, when chamber music was performed in a small circle of professional musicians and amateurs. On such occasions, he always manifested the most obliging readiness to play pianoforte pieces, and, when he extemporised, his former genius is said frequently to have peered out from the keys in a pleasing and attractive manner, and sometimes exactly as though it wanted sadly to take leave of the old master; for the latter, only too often, directly he had finished playing, was again silent and plunged within himself. On the 14th December, 1849, a few weeks after he had kept his sixty-seventh birthday, an apoplectic fit delivered him from a life in which he no longer found much enjoyment. As, moreover, her engagement at the theatre had expired and not been renewed, his daughter found herself with her mother in the greatest need. The proceeds of a concert got up by the Liedertafel for the benefit of the two beings thus left behind, together with other assistance from the same society, saved them for the moment from the extremes of want. The daughter is said shortly afterwards to have become the wife of a merchant abroad. The Liedertafel had the deceased composer buried with fitting solemnity, and is, at the present day, the guardian and keeper of his lonely grave.

Thus, when the memory of him had already to a certain extent died away in the scenes of his former triumphs, ended an artist who for many years had been honoured in Germany as very few other artists had been honoured, and who was a favourite with the people. With the innumerable laurel wreaths which he won first as a pianist, and then as the composer of unsurpassed choral pieces, melodious songs, popular operas and melodramas, sterling specimens of chamber music, and sacred productions, the gifts of fortune were by no means combined. He had nearly always to struggle with pecuniary difficulties. The helplessness in practical matters, so often accompanying geniality, was the cause of this as well as of the fact that he could never gain a firm footing by means of a professional appointment.

As already hinted above, no different was the fate of another favourite of the German people, Albert Lortzing, who 14 years later, ended in Berlin a no less melancholy artistic existence. Our Echo, in its first annual series (1851) consecrated some impressive articles from the pen of its then editor, E. Kossak, to the catastrophe, and we take this opportunity of directing attention to them. In the one case as in the other, with Lortzing as with Kreutzer, there was an unsuccessful struggle for existence; in the one case as in the other, an apoplectic stroke brought a life of trouble to an easy end, and to neither composer was wanting the melancholy termination which surmounts the earthly pilgrimage of so many artists with a crown of martyrdom.

* From the Berlin Echo.

Dancing Days.

The band strikes up a lively air,
That sets young toes a-prancing;
I steal away and take a chair
To watch the others Dancing.
I once could shake a nimble toe—
It's lost its spring (you know, Ver Non semper viret)—be it so!
My Dancing days are over!

I still can watch while others skip,
And think how erst I hopped it,
Ere gouty toe, rheumatic hip,
And feeble ankle stopped it.
What need to envy lad or lass
Because they live in clover,
While I am munching chaff and grass—
My Dancing days are over!

Let happy youth enjoy its spring—
It will not last for ever!
In vain to its delights we cling,
Time forces us to sever.
So let them laugh while laugh they can!
Who wishes them at—Dover,
Or farther—is a soured old man,
Whose Dancing days are over!

But I am growing grey and old,
And looking-on is dreary;—
I feel I'm getting tired and cold,
And find the fun is weary.
From slippers and an easy chair,
Ah, why was I a rover; [there!—
Would I were now at home, for,
My Dancing days are over!

I envy not the merry lot,
Who gaily skip and caper;—
But, oh, I miss my pipe and pot,
My fire, and evening paper.
Good night! I'm off! Nor will again
From my fire-side, by Jove, err.
Let others Dance. To me it's plain,
My Dancing Days are over!

Fun.

Bussetto.—The roof of the Teatro Comunale lately fell in, on account of the mass of snow accumulated on it. The damage is estimated at above 15,000 lire. Fortunately the Theatre is never open.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

(From the "Daily Telegraph.")

It was natural and right for the Philharmonic Society to make some public sign of regard for the genius and memory of Sterndale Bennett. In a letter of condolence to the children of our dead master, the directors said, "The Philharmonic Society claim the proud distinction of having discovered and fostered Sir Sterndale Bennett's genius from the very first." "This bond of union," they added, "will become a matter of history, and not only the existing but future members will be proud of their connection with the society of which he was also for many years so true and faithful a member, as well as the conductor of its concerts." By way of practical comment upon these very proper expressions, the directors gave up the first part of the opening programme to works from the pen of the late chef d'orchestre. We could find no fault, if ever so disposed to be captious, with the manner in which this was done on Thursday night. For the time, St James's Hall became the temple of Bennett's fame. A bust of the deceased master, modelled by Signor Trentanove, from a cast taken after death, faced the audience, and in front of the gallery was hung Millais's fine portrait. Best of all, Sterndale Bennett's genius was illustrated by works not included in the limited repertory from which other memorial performances have had their materials drawn. This time the G minor symphony, the F minor concerto, the Naiades and Paradise and the Peri overtures were passed by in favour of selections which, if not greater as music, were less familiar and better adapted to strengthen the public estimate of the composer's gifts. The concert began with all that Bennett completed of the incidental music to Sophocles's Ajax. Having in mind, perhaps, what Mendelssohn achieved for Antigone and Œdipus, the composer intended to do the same for Ajax, and many amateurs will remember how, nearly three years ago, their hopes were raised by the production of an orchestral prelude to that tragedy at a Philharmonic Concert. The expectations thus formed were, however, doomed to be disappointed. Apart from some sketches for the last chorus, Bennett wrote only a Funeral March, which, after a repetition of the Prelude, was played for the first time on Thursday. We are thankful to have heard it, and also that the Prelude has had another chance of revealing its mingled strength and delicacy. Here is no common music, apart from the fact that, like everything Bennett wrote, it is polished to the last degree. The dramatic significance of the movement cannot be overlooked, but even upon this we do not insist so much as upon those qualities, hard to define though irresistible in their action, which constitute the impress of genius. In every passage a master speaks; and therefore those who have ears for a master's language cannot choose but hear. This is even more obviously the case in the Funeral March.

> "But come all ye who would attend
> The last departure of a friend,
> Hither in solemn procession strong,
> Bearing the solemn bier along,
> Following the dead for a little way,
> Out of the light of the glaring day."

The lines suggest a recent scene in Westminster Abbey, of which he who illustrated them had no prevision when composing his last work. None the less striking, however, is the coincidence, and with none the less interest was the music heard by those among a strangely cold audience who leavened the gathering with a little sympathy. The March is, anyhow considered, a noteworthy production. It is so in its masterful grasp of resources and command of expression, and equally so in its wide divergence from the composer's general style. Bennett's muse loved tenderness and gentle grace, but here it is noble and grand —masculine in force, and marked by no more of softness than just so much as is needed to complete an heroic character. The work, therefore, came as a surprise, and, if possible, heightened our regret that he who achieved it lies where there is neither "knowledge nor device." But we have the consolation of knowing that his swan's song is worthy of his fame, and not a memorial of exhausted fancy and decaying power. Following the march came The Woman of Samaria—that strangely neglected, though altogether beautiful work, the day of which has yet to dawn. Some one said of Bach that he wrote not for his own century, but for the next; and if Bennett's cantata has been treated with neglect it is because the music is literally "music of the future." The time will come when its uncompromizing adherence to the highest behests of art, its utter disdain of clap-trap, its solid yet graceful structure, its grave though tender sentiment, and its musicianly skill, will meet with acknowledgment. That time may never be ours, in which case so much the worse for us, because we cannot share the credit of it; but, at all events, we are happy to believe that justice will sooner or later reward a noble creation of art. The Philharmonic Society did good service by producing the cantata—so much good service that we will not be severe upon the many shortcomings of the performance.

The second part of the concert was distinguished by Herr Joachim's splendid execution of Mendelssohn's violin concerto. Miss Edith Wynne, Madame Patey, Mr Cummings, and Mr Santley were the solo vocalists; Mr Cusins, as usual, occupying the conductor's seat.

MR H. L. BATEMAN.

Few deaths could cause such general and profound regret among the best class of English playgoers as that of Mr H. L. Bateman, which, as already announced, occurred on Monday night. A native of Maryland, he became equally celebrated on both sides of the Atlantic, and his biography, which is worthy to be written, would tell the story of an admirable energy and a sound judgment employed on as high a purpose as lay within the sphere of his activity. He has appeared in three capacities. First, he was known as the father of the "Bateman Children," who were famed for the display of histrionic talent at a very early age. Infant Roscii commonly balance the precocity of their youth with an inglorious maturity, but while the younger "child" has long retired into private life, the elder (now Mrs Crowe) remains with us, and retains all her popularity. It was as the father of Miss Bateman and the director of her performances that Mr Bateman appeared in his second capacity. In the third, which dates from the autumn of 1871, when he became manager of the Lyceum Theatre, he stood gallantly forward as the promoter of an intellectual and morally irreproachable drama at a day when the theatrical world was threatened with a deluge of vice and frivolity. The marvellously-successful revival of Hamlet was the crowning triumph of the "old Colonel," as he was familiarly called in theatrical circles, and this had reached its height when he almost suddenly expired.

A correspondent sends to the Times the following particulars respecting Mr Bateman's sudden death.

"On Sunday last Mr Henry Irving gave a dinner to a large number of theatrical friends, of whom Mr Bateman was one, at the Pall Mall Restaurant. Mr Irving's hospitality having been prolonged somewhat beyond the legal hour for closing licensed houses, about half-past 11 o'clock he was surprised by the appearance of a posse of police constables, headed by their superior officer, who rather unceremoniously required that the company should at once separate. Mr Bateman, who was sitting upon Mr Irving's right hand, being of a somewhat excitable temperament, protested in good set terms, at the same time offering his address-card and those of several other gentlemen present to the chief officer, who is stated to have peremptorily replied that he wanted no cards, but that what he requred was the immediate dispersal of the party. Mr Bateman was excessively indignant, and, having given expression to his feelings, presently withdrew to the Westminster Club, of which he and several of the gentlemen present were members. At the Club the incident narrated formed the subject of animated discussion up to an advanced hour, when the company separated, Mr Bateman returning to his residence at Rutland Gate. Rising at an early hour on Monday morning he was in the act of dressing, when he complained of an unusual pain in the region of the heart, and, complying with the advice of his family, he lay down upon his bed, where he remained throughout the day. In the evening Miss Isabel Bateman left her father's house to enact her rôle of Ophelia at the Lyceum Theatre, without the smallest apprehension of the serious nature of her father's illness. At 7 o'clock Mr Bateman appeared to be in a calm sleep. Shortly after 9 o'clock he was discovered to be dead, and the medical man summoned on the instant pronounced that death must have occurred fully two hours previously. Intelligence of the sad event reached the theatre about 10 o'clock, but it was prudently considered desirable not to interrupt the performance, and Miss Bateman, while passionately declaiming upon the death of her fictitious parent Polonius, was happily ignorant of the death at the same moment of her own father."

DEATH.

On the 18th March, Mr William Mann, professor of the clarionet—well known and much respected.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Limnander.—The work is not one to be criticized seriously. Judging by its contents, and the manner of their arrangement, it may be compared with a huckster's store, or the warehouse of a rag and bottle merchant. Mistakes as to fact are the rule, not the exception. Grammar equivocal; English ostracized (where not gallicized); criticism, which is not criticism at all. In his preface the author owns his obligations to divers pundits; but the worth of these obligations it would be difficult to weigh. There is a continued obtrusion of personality, at the expense of impersonality, although the author hides his name (and light) under a bushel of bushels.

The Musical World,

LONDON, SATURDAY, MARCH 27, 1875.

THE twenty-fifth Monday Popular Concert of the season 1874-75 was one of more than average interest. The programme was nicely balanced between the old school and the new, aptly illustrating the gradual progress, step by step, from one to the other. There was, for instance, Haydn—"Papa Haydn," so-called, although his musical utterances sound younger and fresher than those of a vast number of his progeny; then Beethoven, who, as Schumann said of Schubert, "flashed like a fiery meteor in the skies;" then Schumann, Beethoven's most zealous champion and disciple; and, lastly, Brahms, Schumann's hope, when yet in ripe maturity the elder master was himself no longer productive. The instrumental part was drawn from these fertile sources. We have one objection to urge, however, against the manner in which the programme was laid out. Instead of Brahms coming first, and Haydn last, it would strike most amateurs that Haydn should come first, and Brahms last—unless Mr Chappell may have had it in his head to give the old master the final word, and thus allow him, in his own familiar way, to protest, or nod approval, as to the manner in which the art had been progressing since he ceased to contribute to its treasures. It is not very likely that Haydn's verdict would have been unfavourable, admitting that the examples of modern music here submitted to his judgment represent the absolute status quo. True, the opening movement of his own quartet in D minor (so closely akin to Mozart's in the same key), one of the six, by the way, dedicated to Haydn, begins rather gloomily; but, as the work proceeds, the mists disperse, and long before the end of the rondo all is sunshine. None knew better than Haydn that art must move on. He was himself an innovator, and a pioneer of progress.

Each of the concerted pieces was led by Herr Joachim, who stands, if possible, still higher than before in public favour. He is playing more magnificently than ever, unfolding the beauties and interpreting the meaning of the greatest masters, from J. S. Bach—to Mendelssohn (we need not fill up the hiatus with other well-known names), in his own incomparable manner, occasionally introducing some of those extraordinary compositions of earlier writers for the violin, chiefly Italian, which may be said to have led gradually up to Paganini, who, with consummate ability, put them all to their proper uses, and blended them into one style—which style became his own. With these we need scarcely say that Herr Joachim is as conversant as with the sonatas of Bach, the quartets of Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Schumann, Mendelssohn, Spohr, and Schubert. On the occasion to which we now refer no display piece of the kind, however, was set down for the magnanimous "virtuoso," whose exertions were limited to the concerted music which formed a conspicuous feature in the programme. For Brahms Herr Joachim has always entertained a special predilection. To him we owe the introduction (1867) of the sextet (first of two works in the same form), which headed the programme in question; and, indeed, Herr Joachim has done more than anyone else to encourage and promote a taste in this country for the music of Germany's "rising star." He plays it con amore, with an intense earnestness and warmth of expression that cannot fail to enlist sympathy, and, as it were, by force compel hearers into feeling as he himself feels. This, the fourth performance of the sextet in B flat, is not very likely to be the last. Meanwhile what becomes of the sextet in G?

CONCERTS are becoming more and more numerous as the Spring advances. True, there is no longer that broad line of distinction which at one time, in the matter of musical entertainment, used to separate winter from summer; but there are still many amateurs who can only understand the London musical "season" as virtually beginning somewhere about the period when Italian singers, or, as may now be said, singers of all nationalities, come from abroad, to enchant the patrons of what, through force of habit, continues to be accepted as "Italian" opera. That glad period is close at hand, and upon it follows the temporary interruption of certain special undertakings which, at St James's Hall, Exeter Hall, the Royal Albert Hall, St George's Hall, the Crystal Palace, &c., for six months and more, have provided largely for the taste of the great musical public. We must shape our course accordingly. Indeed, there is no alternative to speak of—none, at any rate, worth an hour's consideration.

JEANIE.*

You've forgotten me now, Jeanie,
And your evenings by the sea,
When the silvered mist of twilight
Crept upon us silently.

And we heeded not the twilight,
Nor the shadows as they fell,
While you listened to the story
I had longed, yet feared, to tell.

You've forgotten how we loitered
Homewards by the churchyard stile;
Talking of the days you'd brighten,
Building castles all the while.

And I thought you true and tender,
And the world so fair and bright,
As your sweet smile gleamed upon me
Thro' the starry veil of night.

And I never told you, Jeanie,
How I toiled the long nights through
For the little store I gathered,
And the home I made for you.

And when all my hopes seemed brightest,
From my life its sunshine fled,
For you changed and left me, Jeanie,
And the old sweet love was dead.

Louisa Gray.

CONCERTS VARIOUS.

ALEXANDRA THEATRE.—Last Saturday was the evening appointed for Mr Pede's benefit (the able and persevering manager). The programme was varied, and consisted of the American drama, Under the Gaslight; the waterfall scene from Mr Pede's very pretty opera The Magic Pearl (in which Miss Beresford made her début); a characteristic Ballet divertisement; and M. Charles Lecocq's opera, Eighteen Years in one Hour, (Le Rajah de Mysore). The entertainment gave evident satisfaction, and Mr Pede, we hope, was satisfied in a pecuniary, as he must have been in an artistic, point of view.—F. A. JEWSON.

HERR SCHUBERTH, founder and director of the Schuberth Society, gave a concert at St Peter's Hall, Underhill Road, Dulwich, on Tuesday evening last, assisted by Miss Violet Grandville, Miss Kate Sullivan, and Herr Warrenrath, as vocalists; and Miss Florence Sanders, Herr Schuberth, Herr Wedemeyer, Mr E. Downs (of Underhill Road), Mr George Webb, and Mr E. Deane, as instrumentalists. The concert commenced with Haydn's Quartet in C major, played by Herr Wedemeyer and his pupil, Mr E. Downs, Mr E. Deane, and Herr Schuberth, and concluded with Mozart's Quintet in A major—Op. 108, for two violins, tenor, violoncello, and clarionet, played by the same artists, and Mr George Webb (clarionet). Sullivan's songs, "Will he come?" and "Orpheus with his lute" were sung by Miss Kate Sullivan. A clarionet solo was played by Mr George Webb; a pianoforte solo on Les Huguenots (Prudent), was played by Miss Florence Sanders; a song by M. Odoardo Barri, a serenata (violoncello obbligato, Herr Schuberth), by Braga, and a scena from Faust, were sung by Miss Violet Grandville; a Danish song (encored), and one by M. Gounod was given by Herr Warrenrath; a violoncello solo—"Intermezzo" (Tours), by Herr Schuberth; and a trio in C major, for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello, by Haydn, was played by Mr E. Deane, Mr E. Downs, and Herr Schuberth. The concert altogether satisfied a very appreciative audience.

PROVINCIAL.

SCARBOROUGH.—An interesting event took place on March 16th, at Mr Hunt's, Prince of Wales' Hotel, South Cliff, viz., the presentation of a massive silver salver, and a silver mounted bâton to Dr Sloman, as a testimonial from the members of the Scarborough Amateur Vocal and Instrumental Society—a society which he established, and which he has successfully conducted, during the past five years. Dr Sloman being about to leave Scarborough, the members of the above-named society, and other friends, determined to present him with some material expression of their appreciation of his ability as a musician, and of the gentlemanly courtesy and kindness he has so unvaryingly manifested during the course of his professional and personal intercourse with them. The presentation was made by W. H. Smyth, Esq., who made a suitable speech, and Dr Sloman then eloquently and feelingly returned thanks. At the close of the proceedings the salver was handed round for the inspection of the company. Its massive character and chaste pattern were equally admired. It bore in the centre the following inscription:—"Presented to R. Sloman, Esq., Mus. Doc., by the members of the Scarborough Amateur Vocal and Instrumental Society, as a token of esteem, and in recognition of his gratuitous services as Conductor of the Society during the past five years.—Scarborough, 17th March, 1875." The bâton was also much admired.

HERR JOACHIM has left London for the Continent.

MDLLE MARIE KREBS and Dr Hans von Bülow will, we are informed, spend a portion of the summer season in London.

THE illness of the Marquis de Caux, in St Petersburgh, was, though sharp, happily not of long duration. Madame Patti is now in Vienna, where she will be rejoined in a few days by her husband, then, it is hoped, completely restored to health. Mdme Patti's representations at the Opera, Vienna, will, therefore, take place as announced.

HER MAJESTY'S OPERA.—About Mr Mapleson's prospectus, just issued for the approaching season, we must defer speaking until our next number. Enough, at present, that it is full of promise, and that its not least interesting feature is the absolute pledge to produce Wagner's Lohengrin, with a cast as things go that could scarcely be made stronger.

FOR Easter Monday two concerts are announced in the Royal Albert Hall. Mdme Lemmens-Sherrington, Miss Edith Wynne, Miss Antoinette Sterling, Mr Edward Lloyd, and Signor Foli, will sing popular songs and ballads at both, and Dr Stainer play solos on the great organ. Glees will be sung at the afternoon concert by the Glee Party, under Mr Montem Smith's direction, and, in the evening, part-songs by the Part-Song Choir of the Royal Albert Hall Choral Society.

Paper.

". . . A handmaid and messenger of Memory.
A recorder of the aspirations of Genius."

(From "Another World.")

There is a peculiarity in the leaf of the Allmanyuka which I will now mention; but, to make myself intelligible, I must give you some few facts about our paper, of which we have an unlimited supply, and which is made from the leaves of nearly every kind of tree, gathered just before they begin to fade, but whilst still green. Dead leaves are used for other purposes.

The leaves of some trees make finer paper than others, and, though every kind of leaf is available, one kind only at a time is used to make paper of the finest quality. Mixed leaves are used to make paper of a common and coarser kind.

All papers, when dried in the sun, have a glossy surface, and none can be torn, or ignited by the application of fire; the paper will smoulder, but not burst into flame. Our paper is transparent, and is besides so very light, soft, and pliable, that in warm weather it is used for children's dresses. Very pretty it is to see the graceful movements of the little creatures' limbs through the pellucid costumes, which are made complete without a seam, the material being most beautifully fine, like one of the silk gauzes of your India.

In our world it was well known that paper could be made from rags, but this material was not as plentiful as leaves, and we discovered, moreover, that it was injurious to the workmen, whilst the manufacture from leaves not only produces a paper far superior to that made with rags, but is a most healthful occupation.

Our trees are, I believe, more numerous than yours; but you have many trees even in Europe from the leaves of which excellent paper of a kind similar to ours could be made, as for instance, the horse-chestnut and oak. The horse-chestnut leaf makes some of the best paper; the leaves of the lilac-tree and of the apple-tree are also excellent; but perhaps the best leaf of all for very fine paper is the vine leaf, which has less moisture and gives less trouble in the preparation.

In the manufacture of paper the leaves are subjected to a great pressure, and the fragrance emitted from the crushed leaves is delicious, and considered very wholesome, so much so indeed that young children are often sent to reside near the place where the leaves are being crushed to inhale the fragrance.

The original moisture is removed by a substance, chiefly consisting of a very fine sand, beautifully compounded with other materials, and spread over a hard pliant stuff. This laid on the pressed pulp sucks out all the original moisture. The fine sand material, though possessing quite a smooth surface, is like a sponge in its power of suction, and, when used, is unrolled and pressed over the pulp by a machine.

This done, the plate containing the paper is moved to an adjourning part of the building, which is roofless, and is there exposed to the rays of the sun, which finishes the drying process and gives a beautiful glaze or polish to the paper. Nothing so well dries the paper as the sun, as we have proved by frequent experiments. After the sun, fire is the most efficacious agent; but this gives the paper a dead and chill appearance.

Our paper is as good as yours, though not better to write upon. I have already informed you of some of the points of difference between them. Paper can be made to almost any size, and without any seam. One other peculiarity is that our paper makes no more noise when doubled up than a piece of linen.

MUSIC AT BERLIN.

(From our Correspondent.)

The performance of Joseph en Egypte, at the Royal Operahouse, was preceded recently by the finale of Mendelssohn's uncompleted opera of Lorely. Mad. Voggenhuber sang the soprano part. The fragment was received with much applause, and there is no doubt that it gains from being given on the stage, with all the scenic and other accessories appertaining thereto.

Mad. Dreyschock has given, for a charitable purpose, a performance in the Singacademie, of Robert Schumann's Pilgerfahrt der Rose, the choruses being sung by her pupils, male and female, assisted by experienced amateurs. Among the solo vocalists were Mesdlles Schubert, Lammert, and Herr Herrlich. Mad. Dreyschock herself conducted, and Herr Constantin Sternberg accompanied on the piano.—Writing in the Neue Berliner Musikzeitung, Herr Richard Wüerst says:

"Herr Hofmann, who introduced the Swedish ladies to our notice during the course of the winter, hit upon the unfortunate idea of selecting the first act of Richard Wagner's Walküre as the programme of a concert. It is true that, to carry it out, he selected very excellent vocalists, namely, Mdlle Schefsky, from Munich, Herr Gross, the heroic tenor, from Frankfort-on-the-Maine, and Herr Hertzsch, bass, from Liepsic, together with two pianists, Mr Jeffery, from Plymouth, and Herr Fietz, from Gotha. The last two gentlemen know not only how to play, but, also, how to accompany. The venture, based upon the attraction exerted by the famous name of the composer, and by the much talked of work, was, however, a failure. We believe that a spirit of speculation, and not zeal for the "master," or the good cause at Bayreuth, animated the concert-giver in what he did. Whoever means well to Wagner and Bayreuth does not produce in a concert-room a fragment of Die Walküre, bereft of orchestra and scenery. With Mozart, Beethoven, Spohr, Weber, and others, there would be some sense in giving an act of an unknown opera with the piano in a concert-room, for with them the principal thing is the music, and the great feature in that the vocal parts, which, with the orchestral accompaniment, constitute well-rounded and sharply defined compositions. With Wagner, all this is reversed. The orchestra plays, and is accompanied by declamatorially treated vocal parts, the principal thing being no one separate element, such as the drama, the scenery, the orchestra, or the vocal music, but the entire art-work of the Future. Anyone getting up such maimed performances causes people, in a certain degree, to form an erroneous opinion."

The direction of the concert was confided to Herr Mühldörfer, of Leipsic. A second concert, for the benefit of the Bayreuth Grand-National-Festival-Stage-Play-Theatre was given a short time after the first, but the room presented a beggarly account of empty benches.

WHO WOULD NOT BE A BOY AGAIN?

(Copyright.)

'Mid life's dull cares, when mem'ry turns
To some long vanished joy,
Who has not thought—who ne'er has felt—
Once more were I a boy?
What gentle dreams were wont to fill
Our peaceful slumbers then!
Oh! happy dreams, that never come
In after years again!
Who would not be a boy again—
A frank, light-hearted boy—
Without a grief, without a care,
To cloud the present joy?

With bounding heart at break of dawn,
To wake to new delight;
Glad heralds of the opening day,
Sweet visions through the night.
To live again with young heart's glee
The giddy hours of play;
To conjure back the cherished hopes
Rude time hath swept away.
Oh! I would be a boy again—
A frank, light-hearted boy—
With no cold sense of wasted years
To still the pulse of joy.

ADA LESTER.

SIGNOR SCHIRA AT VENICE.

(From a Correspondent.)

The Directors of the Fenice have addressed the following letter to Sig. Schira:—

DIRECTION OF THE TEATRO DELLA FENICE,
No. 368. Venice, 24th February.

The brilliant success obtained at this theatre by your opera, Selvaggia, has confirmed the reputation which you deservedly enjoy among musical composers. The Direction, admiring the talent for which you are distinguished, are delighted that continued applause should have recompensed, as was but just, your fine work, and trust that ere long they will be present at the production, on the same stage, of some other score of yours, being certain that they will be present at a fresh triumph. With the greatest consideration,

The Direction:—GIOVANNI LAZZARI,
GIUSEPPE CONTIN,
DR GIUSEPPE ZANRINI.
G. BRENNA, Secretary.

To the CAVALIERE FRANCESCO SCHIRA,
Maestro di Musica.

It is affirmed that, in consequence of the great success achieved by Selvaggia, another opera, Lia, by the same genial composer, will be produced next Carnival.

A Nautical Song.

(For Music.)

To sail the seas is my delight,
And bend a bowline on a bight,
To fish the cro'jack yard, and haul
On topsail lifts, true bliss I call.
I'd fling mynabblin's to the crowds
To scale the giddy futtock shrouds.
So yeo heave ho!
Stand by! Let go! [below.
While skulks and lubbers sneak

An everlasting joy pursues [clews,
The sheets, the buntlines, and the
Amid the rattlins gaily strays,
And keeps on sliding down the stays,
And through the deadeyes and the sheaves
Unending bliss for ever reeves.
Spite rain or fog
Let's heave the log,
And toast her in three-water grog!

The cockroach on the giddy truck
Shall note us, envious of our luck,
Shall grovel on the lower deck
And whip a lanyard round his neck,
Or with a Matthew Walker knot
Shall end his most unhappy lot.
So haul away!
Cast loose! Belay!
(For that's the sort of thing to say).

Hurrah! till cruel Fate forbids
I'll dwell 'mid marlinespikes and fids,
And dissipate all thoughts of gloom
With bobstays or a stunsail boom.
If life with sorrow crowns my cup,
I'll send the mizen-topsail up,
And with a sneer
The chafing gear
I'll calmly bid to disappear!

Fun.

MILAN.—Ponchielli's opera, I Lituani, revised and augmented, has been produced at the Scala. The principal artists, Signora Mariani, Signori Maini, Bolis, and Pantaleoni, were good; the chorus and orchestra efficient. The next opera will be La Lega, by Sig. Yosse.—M. Adolphe Adam's Postillon de Longjumeau is announced at the Teatro Santa Radegonda.—The company at the Teatro Carcano have been playing La Forza del Destino, Ione, and Il Guarany.

BERLIN.—At the Reichshallen Concert, on March 10th, under the direction of Professor Julius Stern, the programme contained the following pieces:—Unfinished Symphony, B Minor—Schubert; Concerto for piano—Liszt (played by Herr Ratzenberger); the "Liederkeis" of Beethoven (sung by Mdlle Conradi); Loreley, a Legend for Orchestra, with harp obbligato, by C. Oberthür (the harp part played by Herr W. Posse, of the Royal Operahouse); Overture to Tannhäuser, and Fantasia for the harp on airs from Oberon—Parish-Alvars (played by Herr W. Posse).

PRAGUE.—The Bohemia of March 9th, in its report of the fourth concert of the Conservatorium, says that there was a particular interest in the programme in consequence of Herr Oberthür, first professor of the harp at the London Academy of Music, and honorary member of the Prague Conservatorium, being announced to play. We had the opportunity, six years ago, of hearing this renowned artist at a concert of the Conservatorium. Without making comparisons with the former "Liszt of the harp," we may state that Herr Oberthür again proved himself the first performer on the "royal" instrument of our days. He played Parish-Alvars' Concerto (with orchestra) in E, showing a complete mastery over all its difficulties; also a Fantasia of his own composition, "Souvenir de Londres," with equally charming effect. Herr Oberthür was cordially received, recalled after every piece, and compelled to play another solo.

BRUSSELS.

(From a Correspondent.)

In consequence of the indisposition of MM. Warot and Devoyod, the production of La Reine de Chypre, at the Théâtre Royal de la Monnaie, has had again to be postponed. M. Devoyod's place will be temporarily filled by M. Rougé, who has consented to play the part of Lusignan, to extricate M. Compocasso from an embarrassing position—the public growing impatient. La Reine de Chypre, by MM. Saint-Georges and Halévy, was brought out in Paris on the 22nd December, 1841, and in this capital on the 21st August, 1844. With the title Catarina Cornaro, Königin von Cypern, M. de Saint-Georges' libretto was translated into German, for the Theatre Royal at Munich, where it was represented with music by F. Lachner, on the 3rd December, 1841—that is to say, nineteen days before Halévy's work was produced at the Grand Opera, Paris.

M. Edmond Vander Straeten has made an interesting discovery in the Belgian Archive Office, concerning the death of Jean Tinctoris, to whom the town of Nivelles will shortly erect a bronze statute. The greatest musical theorist of the 15th century died in 1511. This date, hitherto unknown, confirms two other facts: the return of Tinctoris to the low countries, and his appointment to a canonry in the collegial church of Nivelles. The following is a literal translation of the document (which is in Flemish), found by M. Vander Straeten:—"Of a petition for Pierre de Coninck to enter into possession of a prebend at Nivelles, vacant by the death of the late Maître Jean Tinctoris, and this in virtue of certain apostolic bulls, etc., of the date of the 12th October, 1511; (signed): HANE DEN VIJ S. VJ."

SPRING.

(Copyright.)

How the old earth brightens
At the touch of Spring!
And her dark face lightens
With rare blossoming!
Snowdrops, lilies, "lady-smocks,
All silver white," appear;
White thorn, primroses in flocks,
And May-bloom—sweetest there.
How the old earth brightens
At the touch of Spring!
And her dark face whitens
With rare blossoming!

Robes of velvet greenness
Newly deck her form;
Winter's blight and meanness
Gone with Winter's storm.
The daisies on her breast awake;
And streams, with chattering glee,
Bright glancing in the sunshine, make
Her garments' broiderie.
How the old earth brightens, &c.

O, thou sweet new-comer!
Welcome to our eyes,
More than regal summer,
With her gorgeous skies.
Thou wakener of bird-voices
In every budding tree,
Each grateful heart rejoices
To hail and welcome thee.
How the old earth brightens, &c.

March, 1875. MARIA THANETTA WILLIAMS.

PAU.—Mdlle de Belloca has been singing here with great success in Il Barbiere.

CAIRO.—Both Dinorah and Verdi's Mass are in rehearsal at the Vice-Regal Theatre.

BARCELONA.—M. Ambroise Thomas' Mignon has proved a great success at the Teatro del Liceo.

TRIESTE.—Verdi's Aïda and Requiem Mass for Manzoni will be performed at the Teatro Comunale next autumn.

LIÉGE.—La Statue, by M. Ernest Reyer, has just been performed at the Théâtre Royal, M. Monjauze singing the principal part, which he "created" at the Théâtre-Lyrique, Paris, in 1861.

WAIFS.

Dr Robert Sloman has been presented with a handsome testimonial from the Scarborough Amateur Vocal and Instrumental Society.

Mdlle Ida Corani, according to a telegram received from Catania, by the Italian journal, Il Trovatore, made a furore in Lucia, at the Italian Opera in that city, and was "recalled" several times in the course of the evening.

The Lord Mayor and the Lady Mayoress entertained a select circle of guests at a semi-private banquet on Tuesday evening, in celebration of the Golden Wedding of Mr and Mrs Ransford. A large number of his friends and admirers took advantage of the opportunity to testify their esteem for the veteran by subscribing to a very handsome service of plate, which was presented to him by his Lordship.

It is with much regret that we announce the death of Mr H. L. Bateman, the well-known manager of the Lyceum Theatre. Up to Sunday evening the deceased gentleman was supposed to be in the enjoyment of perfect health. On Monday morning, however, he was taken suddenly ill, and in the evening, while the play of Hamlet was proceeding, quietly passed away in his sleep at home, the exact moment being unknown. It is believed that Mr Bateman was suffering from disease of the heart. In consequence of this melancholy occurrence the performances at the theatre are suspended till Monday.

The third concert of the Royal Albert Hall Amateur Orchestral Society was given on Saturday evening. His Royal Highness the Duke of Edinburgh took his accustomed seat in the orchestra, and at half-past eight the performance commenced with Mendelssohn's Italian Symphony. In the overture to La Gazza Ladra the band played with a confidence rare in an amateur orchestra. The introduction to the 3rd act of Lohengrin was repeated by "request." The band accompanied the Clarionet obbligato, from Mozart's Clarionet Quintett, played by Mr Leonard Beddome, an amateur possessing ability. Auber's Diamans de la Couronne, overture brought the concert to an end. The vocalists appeared to be suffering from the colds more or less epidemic during the last month. Between the parts of the concert, Mr W. S. Bambridge gave a composition of his own and Henry Smart's Allegro Pomposo on the great organ. The Princess of Wales and Duchess of Edinburgh honoured the performance with their presence. The hall was well filled, and the result will undoubtedly prove acceptable to the Middlesex Hospital, for whose benefit the concert was given. The next is fixed for the 24th of April, when an endeavour will be made to give some choral and orchestral compositions, in which the Royal Albert Hall Choral Society may co-operate with the Amateur Orchestral Society.

ROME.—Aïda continues very attractive at the Teatro Apollo.

ST PETERSBURGH.—Four new and original operas by Russian composers are to be produced in this capital, Moscow, and Kiew, respectively, during the coming season. They are Angelo, by Cæsar Kui; Wakula, the Smith, by Tschaikoffsky and Mussorsky; Chowansky's Partisans, by Mussorsky; and St Mary's Grove, by Galler.

THE VOICE & SINGING

BY

ADOLFO FERRARI.

THE FORMATION AND CULTIVATION OF THE VOICE FOR SINGING.

Price 12s.

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, REGENT STREET, W.

"The remarkable qualities of this book are the author's freedom from conventional trammels, the strong sense of his opinions, and the novelty yet evident soundness of his precepts; his work has consequently come into general use as a manual of vocal instruction."—Daily News.

DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE,

For invigorating and enriching the voice, and removing affections of the throat.

DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE is universally acknowledged to be the most valuable remedy for sore throat, hoarseness and relaxed throat. It should always be taken before singing or reciting, as it strengthens the vocal organs. It is most extensively prescribed by the faculty for the throat and voice. Dr Lewis of Basingstoke says he finds them most efficacious, and in Dr Copland's Dictionary of Practical Medicine (Longman & Co.), they are strongly recommended at pages 872 and 1492. They are used by all the greatest vocalists and orators in Europe, and have been established over a quarter of a century. Testimonials from Patti, Grisi, Lablache, Santley, &c. Sold in boxes, 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. by all Chemists throughout the United Kingdom and the Colonies.

ARTHUR SULLIVAN'S NEW SONG,
"THOU ART WEARY,"
WORDS BY ADELAIDE PROCTOR.
MUSIC BY ARTHUR SULLIVAN.
SUNG BY
MISS ANTOINETTE STERLING
AT THE
MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

"The singer was Miss Antoinette Sterling, who, always heartily admired in those German ballads, for which she exhibits so marked a sympathy, introduced in a group four of Schumann's most graceful contributions to the Lieder repertory, and, later in the evening, a new song by Mr Arthur Sullivan, 'Thou art weary' (set to words by Adelaide Proctor)—one of the most charming recent emanations from the pen of our gifted compatriot."—The Times, Nov. 10.

"Miss Sterling was the vocalist, and sang, in addition to selections from Schumann, a new song by Arthur Sullivan, entitled, 'Thou art weary,' which is one of the most beautiful and thoughtful effusions of the composer's graceful music."—Daily Telegraph, Nov. 12.

"Miss Antoinette Sterling was the vocalist. In the second part she introduced a new song by Mr Sullivan, an admirable setting for a contralto voice of some very touching lines by the late Miss Adelaide Proctor, addressed by a poor mother to her starving child, the burden being—

'Sleep, my darling, thou art weary;
God is good, but life is dreary.'

The song exactly suited Miss Sterling's voice and style, and it will assuredly become as great a favourite as 'Will he come,' to which it is a worthy pendant, and the words of which are also by Miss Proctor."—Standard, Nov. 12.

"Miss Antoinette Sterling repeated Mr Sullivan's new song, 'Thou art weary,' a second hearing of which has confirmed our good opinion of it."—Standard, Nov. 16.

"At the concert on Monday, Miss Sterling had introduced a series of charming Lieder by Schumann, and a new song by Mr Arthur Sullivan, 'Sleep, my darling, thou art weary,' an admirable setting of Miss Proctor's poem, 'Hush, I cannot bear to see thee,' which, like everything Miss Proctor wrote, was well adapted for, and, in fact, seemed to invite musical treatment. Her verses have inspired Mr Sullivan with a genuine melody, of which the refrain is particularly remarkable; and the song, both at Monday's and Saturday's concert, pleased so much that Miss Sterling was called upon to repeat it."—Pall Mall Gazette, Nov. 17.

"Miss Sterling sang discreetly and sympathetically four of Schumann's 'Dichterliebe' (Nos. 1, 2, 7, and 8); but came off still better in a new song by Mr A. Sullivan, who has set words by Adelaide Proctor, 'Thou art weary,' the dying consolation of a starved mother to her child, the refrain of which is—

'Sleep, my darling, thou art weary;
God is good, but life is dreary.'

It is a painful theme; but the composer has treated it with such pathos that the air tells powerfully."—Athenæum, Nov. 14.

"The vocalist was Miss Sterling, who sang four songs by Schumann (Nos. 1, 2, 7, and 8 of the 'Dichterliebe'), and a new song, entitled 'Thou art weary,' written by Miss Adelaide Proctor. The words are good, and have been fitted to charming and expressive music by Mr Arthur Sullivan, who has added a pianoforte accompaniment worthy his high reputation, and worth listening to for its own sake."—Observer, Nov. 15.

Published in the keys of D minor and F minor, Price 4s.

ARTHUR SULLIVAN'S NEW SONG,
"TENDER AND TRUE,"
SUNG BY
MISS EDITH WYNNE
AT THE
MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS, ST JAMES'S HALL.

"The vocalist was Miss Edith Wynne, who sang a new song, 'Tender and True,' by Arthur Sullivan, the beauty of which, aided by a most tasteful rendering, elicited an encore."—Daily Telegraph, January 13.

"Mr Sullivan's graceful song—a novelty—was rendered by Miss Edith Wynne with much refined expression; and the applause which followed necessitated its entire repetition."—Daily News, January 13.

"A very expressive new song, by Mr A. Sullivan, 'Tender and True,' was sung with such effect by Miss Edith Wynne that it had to be repeated."—Illustrated London News, January 16.

"Miss Edith Wynne, who gave, in her own genuine and expressive manner, a graceful new song, 'Tender and True,' by Mr Arthur Sullivan, which was encored and repeated."—Graphic, January 16.

FIFTY FINGERED EXERCISES FOR THE VIOLIN, selected and Edited by HUBERT RIES. Dedicated to Herr Joachim, who thus writes of the work to the editor:—

"I was very happy to become acquainted with your 'Fingered Exercises,' which, through your ingenious manner of distinguishing the fingers that are to be elevated, and held down, offer an essential help in imparting to scholars an easy position to the hand and an exact knowledge of fingering. I accept, therefore, the dedication of your work thankfully, and will gladly assist in disseminating it."

HER MAJESTY'S OPERA, THEATRE ROYAL, DRURY LANE.

MR MAPLESON HAS THE HONOUR TO INFORM THE PATRONS OF HER MAJESTY'S OPERA THAT THE SEASON WILL BEGIN ON SATURDAY, APRIL 10th.

The performances will again be given in the Theatre Royal, Drury Lane, pending the completion of the Grand National Operahouse, now in course of erection on the Victoria Embankment. Mr Mapleson is much gratified in having secured such an eligible site for the new Operahouse. No better situation could be possibly found in London, on account of its ready access from the fashionable quarters. It is contemplated that the new theatre shall be kept open during nearly the whole year; in summer, for the purpose of giving performances of Italian Opera, and in winter for the production of works by native composers. Mr Mapleson cannot allow this opportunity to pass without thanking Mr F. B. Chatterton, who so readily placed the magnificent theatre at his disposal on the destruction of Her Majesty's Theatre, notwithstanding the many adantageous offers received from other quarters.

The Director, anxious to distinguish his last season at the Theatre Royal, Drury Lane, has arranged to produce, for the first time in this country, Herr RICHARD WAGNER'S renowned chef d'œuvre, "LOHENGRIN," for which new scenery is being prepared by Mr William Beverly. The mise-en-scene and decorations will be of the most elaborate description. The Director refers with pleasure to the cast of this work, feeling confident that it is one of the greatest ever presented. The whole will be under the immediate superintendence of Sir Michael Costa. CHERUBINI'S grand tragic Opera, "MEDEA," will be revived, with new scenery and decorations, Mdlle Tietjens resuming her celebrated character of Medea—a part so eminently qualified to display her genius alike as a singer and an actress. The immense success which attended the production of BALFE'S posthumous work, "IL TALISMANO," must be fresh in the minds of all; but, in consequence of the late period of the season when it was first represented, this opera may be fairly regarded as still a quasi novelty. Madame Nilsson will resume her original character of Edith Plantagenet. "MIGNON" will be performed, for the first time these two years, with an efficient cast, Madame Christine Nilsson again appearing as Mignon.

It is the intention of the Director, in order to meet the increasing taste for works of the highest artistic value, to devote an evening in each week, as an experiment, to the representation of an opera by one of the great classical composers. Mr Mapleson feels assured that by making such an appeal to amateurs, on purely musical grounds, his efforts must obtain their support.

The company will comprise the following artists :—

Mdme CHRISTINE NILSSON.
Mdlle ELENA VARESI (her first appearance).
Mdlle LOUISE SINGELLI.
Mdme MARIE ROZE.
Mdlle CARLOTTA GROSSI (her first appearance these two years).
Mdlle FELICITA PERNINI (her first appearance).

Composed by ALEXANDER REICHARDT.

SUNG BY MDLLE CARLOTTA PATTI.

A peine ai-je vu le printemps
Couvrir dix fois de leur feuillage
Les vieux saules de nos étangs,
Que, sans pitié pour mon jeune âge,
Dieu m'a ravi le guide aimé
Qui me prodiguait ses tendresses!
Je pleure son regard charmé!
Je ne reçois plus ses caresses!

Ainsi parlait, en gémissant,
Une orpheline désolée;
Mais un bel ange, l'embrassant,
Lui dit, d'une voix inspirée:
"Ne pleure plus et sois ma sœur
Ma mère sera notre mère,
Et tu verras que du bonheur
Il en est encor sur la terre!"

ANTONIO SALEIRI.

Let us now return, after this digression, to our interrupted narrative. In February, 1786, Mozart and Salieri actually confronted each other as rivals. The Emperor had ordered two short musical pieces (Singspiele), for a party he intended giving at Schönbrunn to the Governor of the Netherlands. Mozart had to set the German piece Der Schauspieldirector, while the Italian piece, Prima la Musica, was assigned to Salieri. The text of the latter work is witty and full of little genial traits, written by the clever Abbate Casti: Mozart's libretto, by an unknown author, is frightfully vapid. A dispute between two singers, each of whom asserts herself better than the other, constitutes its whole purport. Yet this little work, consisting of only four numbers, is, even at the present day, acknowledged to be a charming score, while Salieri's Prima la Musica has long been consigned to oblivion. Salieri, indeed, was probably indebted for most of his brilliant successes to the partiality of Joseph II., with whom he was a decided favourite, while Mozart had to rely entirely on himself, and could only make his way slowly and with difficulty, though, when he did so, it was for ever.

In the same year, Mozart again entered the lists against Salieri, to whom there was now added a Spaniard, Martini. Salieri appeared with his Grotta di Trofonio (words by Casti), already performed in 1785; Martini with his Cosa rara, an unutterably shallow creation of which Da Ponte wrote the words; and, on the other side, Mozart with his immortal Figaro. La Grotta and the Cosa rara were extolled alle stelle, while, on the first night, Figaro was a complete failure. And here Salieri's injurious influence is no longer to be denied—for which reason Herr von Mosel passes the whole of the sad story over in silence.

Before the performance, Mozart, Sen., writing to his daughter says: "On the 28th April, Le Nozze di Figaro will be played for the first time. There is a great chance of its not succeeding, for I know that it has surprising cabals to fight against. Salieri with his whole party will again attempt to move heaven and earth. Duscheck said to me recently that your brother was the object of so many cabals, because he was held in such great esteem on account of his especial talent and skilfulness."

And so it was. Salieri patronised the unimportant, but supple and flexible Martini, who could never become dangerous to him. But of Mozart he was afraid. He then thought what, after Mozart's early death, he undisguisedly said: "It is good, perhaps that it has so happened—had he" (Mozart) "lived longer, he would have brought us all into discredit."

As Salieri thought, so thought, also, his subordinates; so thought singers and members of the orchestra. To this must be added the fact that Martini's music was easy and catching, so that people could whistle and hum it if they chose as they went home—which, as we know, is not the case with Le Nozze. Thus, when Mozart confided his work to the company, who were emphatically hostile to him, from the director-in-chief down to the last member of the chorus, he was delivering himself up into the hands of his executioners. What could not help happening did happen. Despite a sharp reprimand from the Emperor, the piece was so shamefully performed that it necessarily failed. And it was a long time before it recovered from this failure. In Prague, on the contrary, it excited a furore from the very outset, as did subsequently Don Juan in a still higher degree.

With regard, however, to La Grotta di Trofonio, it is unconditionally the best of Salieri's comic operas, though what Herr von Mosel says about it strikes us as another piece of exaggeration. He names it not only Salieri's best, but one of the first operas of its kind—in fact, he considers it simply classical. Let us rather hear the opinion Da Ponte pronounces on it. His views and impartial praise are the more deserving of respect, because, as we have seen, he by no means belonged to Salieri's friends and unconditional admirers. "At this time he" (Casti) "wrote La Grotta di Trofonio, the second act of which left much to be desired as far as regards art, since it is merely a repetition of the first, and thus completely nullifies the effect. The music (by Salieri) was very fine."

We mentioned above Don Juan. This opera of operas had in Vienna to contend with far greater difficulties than even Le Nozze. The latter saw arrayed against it only a couple of weak musical trifles, whose worthlessness was in time made manifest—but there was, at least momentarily, danger for Don Juan, with its baroque libretto, in contending against Salieri's acknowledged masterpiece, Axur, King of Ormus. Axur was Joseph II.'s favourite opera. Of Don Juan the Emperor said: "That is no morsel for my Viennese." Besides, according to a remark addressed to Da Ponte, he considered that Mozart was by no means a composer of vocal music. And so it was unavoidable that though, when properly performed, it excited in Prague the greatest enthusiasm, Don Juan, badly put upon the stage, and still worse sung and acted, should be completely thrown in the shade by Salieri's Axur, which was founded upon an admirable libretto.

Axur, like Le Nozze, taken from a drama by Beaumarchais, was first set to French words, under the title of Tarare, and produced at the Grand Opera. On his return from Paris, Salieri received the commands of the Emperor to arrange Tarare for the Italian company at Vienna. Hence arose the opera of Axur, which differs in the text, and still more in the music, from the French Tarare. Concerning the mode of the transformation Salieri himself speaks as follows in his diary: "At first we" (Da Ponte and he) "intended to make, in obedience to the commands I had received, merely a translation to be fitted to the existing music. With this object we met, therefore, every morning for three or four days, and worked together. We did so without much pleasure, since we could not feel convinced of obtaining a good result for our pains. The music, written for French singing actors, was too poor in song for Italian play-acting singers. Moreover, when the poet was contented with his verses, the music—to speak like Gluck—tasted a great deal too much of translation. And when, to satisfy my ear, the words were fitted to the existing music, Da Ponte was displeased with his lines. Fearing, therefore, that we both might labour in vain, I determined rather to compose new music to the given subject. I begged the poet, consequently, to sketch out, upon the basis of the French original, a new plot of the story, adapted to the Italian Opera Company, and to distribute, in conjunction with me, the vocal pieces, but otherwise to write the verses as he pleased, I charging myself with the rest of the business."

JOSEPH SEILER.

WAGNER AND LISZT AT PESTH.

(From a Correspondent.)

The Liszt-Wagner Concert has taken place. The large hall of the Redoute was crowded, with the exception of the first circle, the public considering that, in these times, twenty florins was rather too much for a seat. The hall wore a festive appearance. The conductor's desk in front of the platform looked as though growing out of a thicket of laurels. After the opening piece ("Die Glocken von Strassburg"), the said thicket was in danger of being stript of its foliage, for the lady members of the Liszt Association each rushed up to carry away some leaves as a souvenir. Wagner, however, on appearing at the desk, had some amends made him in the shape of a laurel wreath, presented, with a brief address, by Herr Edmund Mihailovitz, in the name of the Wagner Association. His three pieces—Schmiedelieder, Siegfried's Tod, Wotan's Abschied und Feuerzauber—did not strike the general public forcibly, being applauded by the "Wagner Party" alone. The Liszt Association loaded their hero—who played also Beethoven's E flat Concerto—with greater marks of honour than anyone else. Herr Richter conducted the pianoforte concerto; played violin during the Schmiedelieder, and drums in Siegfried's Tod. Wagner left the same evening—in a bad humour, it is said, declining to attend a banquet which was to have been given in his honour.

BRUSSELS.—The event, to which the patrons of the Théâtre de la Monnaie have so anxiously looked forward, has at last come off. La Reine de Chypre has been produced, with a mise-en-scene which surprised everyone; but then the city of Brussels paid the bill. Mdlle Salla, Catarina; M. Devoyod, Lusignan; M. Warot, Gérard de Courcy; M. Echetto, Andrea; and M. Laurent, Moncenigo, acquitted themselves creditably, as did also the orchestra and chorus. M. Campocasso's season is fast waning, and Le Nozze is no longer underlined.—Handel's Judas Maccabæus has been performed, a short time since, under the direction of M. Gevaert, most of the solo singers being pupils of the Royal Conservatory.

Wagner.

Neither the doings of Herr Wagner nor the sayings of his disciples have of late been of a kind to inspire confidence in the movement of which he is the most recent instigator. We say the most recent, because no better illustration of the proverb, "There is no new thing under the sun," could be presented than this same movement which has been made four several times during the short lifetime of modern music. The Florentine Academy in the first years of the seventeenth century, Lully and his disciples towards the end of it, Glück about the middle of the last century, and Meyerbeer in our own time, were all actuated by the same intent, namely, to limit the office of music, in the drama, at least, to the giving point to words and meaning to action. And with one exception they were ready to attain this end by an entire sacrifice of musical form and a general disregard of the principles of musical science, so far as they were acquainted with them. The one exception was Meyerbeer, a man having too thorough an acquaintance with his art as well as with human nature to believe that any permanent hold on the latter could be attained by a partial or imperfect use of the former. Like Wagner, Meyerbeer was a doctrinaire, but he never allowed himself to be overruled by his doctrines; he was able as well as willing to temper their administration by expediency.

Of the musical science of Herr Wagner it is difficult to form anything like an accurate estimate. His claims to the admiration of his disciples, possibly more Wagnerian than himself, avowedly consist in a remorseless sacrifice of melody, form, and development to the exigences of dramatic action. The object of art is not, with the Wagnerians, idealization, nor are its means selection or arrangement. It consists in the presentation of things, if not in the higgledy-piggledy way in which they happen—for so they would be unintelligible as well as unlovely—with no more organization than is absolutely necessary to their being understood. Whether Herr Wagner exercises in his works a self-denial of which there is no precedent in history, and voluntarily eschews the means by which the few musicians whom the world has yet accepted as great have achieved greatness; whether he has ascertained by experiment that musical ideas pure and original do not come at every man's bidding; or whether he has never undergone the training without which no musical idea can be followed out to its utmost consequences, we know not, probably never shall know. We have assisted at more than one performance of two of Herr Wagner's earlier operas, and we thought we recognized in them evidences of musical power which, developed through a well-directed course of exercise, might have made him at least an interesting operatic composer. But the mention of these works, we found, was interdicted by his followers. They received our praises with sickly smiles, indicative of contempt not merely for our judgment—which was to be expected—but for the works themselves, which was not. They were nursery lispings, we were informed, attempts at peregrination in a go-cart, &c., &c. It has never been our good fortune to assist at an adequate presentation of one of Herr Wagner's later operas; indeed, we have our doubts whether one that would quite satisfy his disciples is possible on this planet. We have been told in respect to some, on which we believed every mundane resource had been brought to bear by graduates in the Wagnerian mysteries, that the moral consciousness of the tenor was unequal to the embodiment of the Wagnerian idea; that the psychological affinities of the third and fourth horns were not sufficiently close; or—which was better adapted to our comprehension—that one of the second violins had stopped out of tune in an important passage; or that the artist entrusted with the grosse caisse was suffering from a strain in the wrist brought on by over-exertion at rehearsal. But with two of Herr Wagner's later works we have made personal acquaintance through the only means available to us—the study of his scores. We do not question the possibility, or the fact—for it rests on irrefragable evidence—that the notes which fill page after page of Lohengrin and the Meistersinger set off to great advantage the words and the action of a drama interesting to any cultivated audience and most interesting to a native one. But to regard these notes, save in rare instances, as making anything that musicians—and with them mankind in general—have hitherto agreed to call music, is impossible. Shrieks, groans, sobs, huzzas, cheers, cachinnations, and the like, are "of the nature of" poetry, for they direct emanations from the human heart, but they are not of themselves poetry, nor do they constitute more than a small and insignificant element of it. So abrupt transitions, phrases the tonality in which changes with every progression, sudden changes of intensity, abnormal uses of particular instruments, are "of the nature of," but do not constitute music. If it could be shown that dramatic effect was only attainable through an entire sacrifice of musical form, even that sacrifice, enormous as it would be, might be worthy of consideration; so noble are the ends and aims of dramatic effect. But we deny that anything of the sort has been shown. Three operas were there (Cherubini's, of course), none others existent—Don Giovanni, Medea, and Fidelio—are standing proofs to the contrary. All that has been proved yet is, that Herr Wagner has not succeeded in combining in a dramatic or other work all those elements, the combination of which so eminently characterises the masterpieces of Mozart, Cherubini, and Beethoven.

Meanwhile the latest movement, or "move," of Herr Wagner and his disciples is the dedication of a temple to himself.

BERLIN.

(From a Correspondent.)

The Italian operatic company, under the management of Mad. Artôt, have brought their engagement to a close with a repetition of Il Matrimonio Segreto. Their visit has not been very successful.

The Intendant-General, Herr von Hülsen, has accepted a new opera, Das goldene Kreuz, by Herr Ignaz Brüll, of Vienna.

No less than three Vocal Associations announced Graun's Der Tod Jesu, for Passion Week.

Mdlle Fanny Warburg, a pianist just eighteen, produced a favourable impression at the third Subscription Concert of the Ladies' Association for the benefit of the Gustavus Adolphus Foundation.

Handel's Semele (first time here) was the attraction at the second concert of the St Cecilia Association. The performance was decidedly successful, and reflected credit on solo singers, chorus, orchestra, and, last not least, conductor, Herr Holländer.

Wagner intends giving a concert, at some date to be hereafter fixed, the programme to consist of fragments from his Götterdämmerung. The prices of admission are low, so that the "people," also, may be able to contribute their contingent towards the "National" enterprise at Bayreuth.

J. S. BACH AT ST ANNE'S.

Later in the day (Good Friday) a most interesting service, attended by her Royal Highness the Princess of Wales, took place in St Anne's, Soho—a church long famous on account of bold attempts to extend the resources and improve the character of worship music. Few will require to be told that the organist and choir-master of St Anne's is Mr Barnby, or that, under his direction, for several years past, a Bach Passion has been performed during Lent, with soloists, band, and chorus. This year Mr Barnby's choice fell upon another work by the old German composer, one of his very numerous sacred cantatas. In that known as "God's time is the best," the genius of Bach shines strongly, and Mr Barnby could have made no better selection, nor one more fitted to awaken interest on religious and artistic grounds. The conditions of performance have been throughout Lent, and were yesterday (when the anthem included a copious selection from the Passion of St John), everything that a fastidious taste could desire. Efficient soloists, a numerous and well-trained choir, with an adequate force of instruments, rendered the old master's music admirably—Mr Barnby directing, and Mr J. Coward presiding at the organ. Much might be said about the repeated attempts at St Anne's to give Church music the highest æsthetic importance; but at present it is enough to point to the crowds who attend the Lenten services, and yesterday might have filled the church twice over. That no good is done by such consecration of highest genius to highest purpose few will venture to assert; and it is beyond all question that the Good Friday services at St Anne's were exceeded in interest by none.—Daily Telegraph, March 27.

MR GYE'S PROSPECTUS FOR 1875.

(From the "Times.")

Mr Gye's prospectus describes, with scarcely a word of comment, his arrangements for the season, the operas which, circumstances allowing, he is desirious of presenting, and the artists engaged to support them. He simply indicates the repertory of no less than forty-seven works—three by Mozart, five by Rossini, seven by Donizetti, three by Bellini, six by Meyerbeer, seven by Verdi, four by Auber, two by Gounod, and one each by Cimarosa, Gluck, Beethoven, Weber, Ambroise Thomas, Flotow, Ricci, Campana, Gomez, and Poniatowski—all of which are ready for immediate use, and from which, as a matter of course, he will have to select freely. Added to these, four others are named, "three at least" among which are positively promised. Two of them—Romeo e Giulietta and Semiramide—are not exactly "novelties," both being found in the catalogue of the standard "forty-seven." The revival of M. Gounod's poetical work, after six or seven years' lying by, will afford unanimous satisfaction, both on account of its abstract merits and those of Madame Adelina Patti's Giulietta—an impersonation not easy to forget. Signor Nicolini, too, it is thought, may prove as acceptable a Romeo as just now could easily be met with. Semiramide, which has not been witnessed at the Royal Italian Opera for a lengthened period, is, we may venture to guess, chosen for the sole purpose of providing Madame Vilda with a fresh character adapted to her voice and peculiar idiosyncrasy. The cast is to be strengthened by the co-operation of M. Faure, upon whom devolves the part of Assur, the florid music of which, it might be thought, would hardly suit the vocal means of that popular and cultivated artist. The other operas to which paragraphs apart are awarded cannot fail to excite general interest. Le Pré aux Clercs, the last finished work of the French musician, Hérold (1832), is by no means so familiar among us as Zampa, its predecessor by a year—the vogue of which, nevertheless, in the composer's native country, it equalled, if not surpassed. The Pré aux Clercs was made known to London in the olden time through the medium of an English version, under the title of The Challenge, and years subsequently through the French original—but never before in Italian. The distribution of characters at Covent Garden, we are informed, "is not yet determined on;" so that admirers of French lyric drama after the opéra comique type must refrain from being over-sanguine about its actually appearing this year. Still, as an Italian adaptation, with the necessary accompanied recitatives, &c., is in existence, and has been used on the further side of the Alps, difficulties may be smoothed away. The feature, however, of the Covent Garden prospectus which provokes the most wide-spread curiosity is neither Romeo nor the Pré aux Clercs, but unquestionably the more than once promised Lohengrin, about the production of which this time there cannot be a reasonable doubt, so explicit are the terms of the announcement. The opera of Wagner "has been a considerable time in preparation," and will be given, "with new scenery, costumes, and decorations, early in the season." It does, indeed, seem strange to many that, while Lohengrin and Tannhäuser are heard frequently, not alone in the chief cities of the country in which their composer first saw the light, but (to say nothing of Paris, where both Tannhäuser and Rienzi have been given, with what success is beside the question) in the United States, and even Italy, neither the one nor the other should ever have been introduced to the English public—a public which, if nothing else, is always open to be attracted by what is original and new. The Fliegende Holländer, produced at Drury Lane Theatre during the well-remembered management of Mr George Wood, under the direction of Signor Arditi, with Mdlle Ilma di Murska and Mr Santley in the leading parts, though too late in the season for the usual opera-going public, made so lively an impression as to cause general regret that it had not been brought out earlier. The "cast" of Lohengrin at Covent Garden—unlike that of Hérold's opera, already "determined on"—includes Mdlle Albani (Elsa), Mdlle d'Angeri (Ortrud), Signor Nicolini (Lohengrin), Mdlle Proch, M. Maurel, Signor Bagagiolo, &c. So that, if anticipation is not balked, instead of being announced at two Italian Operas and given at neither, Lohengrin will this year, in all probability, have not only been announced, but actually given, at both. Some enthusiastic admirers of Wagner would have preferred hearing Tannhäuser at one house and Lohengrin at the other; but the millenium must not be looked for in a day.

In Mr Gye's list of engagements we meet with the names of nearly all the favourites of recent years—some of whom have been referred to as taking various parts in the proposed "novelties." The others, as they successively come forward, will doubtless be welcome as of old. The company is strong in every department; and if the advertised new-comers, all or any of them, equal expectation, it will be so much more to the good. There has been a great deal of talk about Mdlle Zaré Thalberg, who is very young, and will make her first appearance on the stage. If she does credit to the name she bears, none will have reason to complain. Mdlle Proch, a daughter, we understand, of the well-known German composer of that name, Signor Tamigno, a tenor who has been lately playing at Venice in Signor Schira's successful opera, Selvaggia, Signor de Sanctis, and Herr Seidemann, are the other strangers.

MR GYE'S FIRST NIGHT.

The season at this house was opened with the customary simple formality of the National Anthem, preceding a performance of Guillaume Tell. Mr Gye has bestowed more than usual care upon his noble theatre in anticipation of a fresh campaign. Not only have the interior and its approaches been made to look their best, as always on first nights, but candelabras are placed around the front of the boxes alternately with the familiar and, to those who sit over them, unpleasant gas jets. The result is increased brilliancy without added glare; and, if the change be simply an experiment, we hope its success may lead to the entire supercession of gas, especially as the present mixture produces an incongruous effect. No doubt the somewhat heavy interior of the theatre requires much light, but that is best obtained in the manner towards which a very decided step has now been taken. With Mr Gye's choice of an opera for his opening performance we should be the last to quarrel. Rossini's grandest work is welcome come when it may, as, indeed, is anything which shows us the lyric drama elevated above the miserable object of displaying a prima donna. Amateurs, moreover, would be very glad to see in the selection of Guillaume Tell a proof that such examples of operatic art are more in favour than once they were with the classes by whom our lyric theatres are in the main supported. Unfortunately for this view of the case, it has become a fashion with the favourites of the public to postpone their rentrée till the season has advanced a little. On no account, probably, would a "first lady" condescend to sing on the opening night of a season. The order to be observed is that of a Royal procession, and happy she who can contrive to bring up the rear. But this arrangement is a trying one for the manager, unless, as at Covent Garden, he commands resources that enable him to start with operas existing more for their own sake than for the behoof of their interpreters. Should such be the reason why Guillaume Tell was played, we get through it a most disagreeable revelation of the present state of the lyric stage in this country. —Daily Telegraph.

THE LATE MR BATEMAN.

(To the Editor of "The Times.")

SIR,—In reply to your correspondent's remarks about the sudden death of Mr Bateman, I beg to state that Mr Irving and myself were the last to leave the dining-room; that I never saw a police-officer until I reached the outer street door. Afterwards I met Mr Bateman at the Westminster Club, and he never mentioned having any altercation with the police-officers. When he left me for his residence, he appeared to be in as good health and cheerful spirits as I have known him to enjoy during the last twelve years. I trust you will publish this statement in justice to the memory of one who was an affectionate husband, a kind father, and a genial friend.

THOMAS SWINBOURNE (Lyceum Theatre).

(To the Editor of the "Daily Telegraph.")

SIR,—As some erroneous statements of the sad death of Mr H. L. Bateman have been published, will you kindly allow me—an old friend, and his doctor for some years—space for a short account of his illness? For some days Mr Bateman complained of a severe pang of pain at the heart. In other respects he was in his accustomed health. On the evening before his death he returned home apparently in good health. He slept soundly during the night. On rising next day, at about ten, he was seized with an agonizing pain over the heart—so severe that, though a strong and resolute man, he was compelled to cry out loudly. I was sent for, and found him still suffering most severely. The pain continued with slight and very temporary remissions till twelve, when it greatly subsided. He remained almost free from pain, and at about four fell into a calm sleep. At half-past six the members of the family who were obliged to go to the theatre left him sleeping calmly and comfortably. His two daughters and son-in-law, who were taking care of him, became alarmed about ten o'clock at the long continuance of his sleep, and, endeavouring to awaken him, discovered that he was dead. The symptoms were those of an unusually severe and prolonged attack of that terrible malady, angina pectoris. The attack was in no way due to excitement, or any other emotional disturbance; but was, probably, immediately caused by the effort of dressing. SYDNEY RINGER.

TRIAL BY JURY.

The joint production of Messrs W. S. Gilbert and Arthur Sullivan, Trial by Jury is a pleasant addition to the bill of fare at Madame Selina Dolaro's pretty theatre in Soho. Its success on the first night, when Mr Sullivan himself directed the orchestra, and both he and his colleague were summoned at the descent of the curtain, was thoroughly genuine. None could feel surprise at such a result. Trial by Jury has the qualities necessary to win acceptance for what professes to be no more than a humorous bagatelle. Its first and not least valuable recommendation is brevity—the whole occupying less than an hour in performance; and this, coupled with the popularity attaching to the names of the authors, is likely to keep a good majority of the audience to the end, although two pieces, one of them La Périchole, with Madame Dolaro as the heroine, precede it in the order of the entertainment. Many, doubtless, were curious to know what kind of impression a brief extravaganza, the united effort of two Englishman, would create immediately after one of the productions, so much in vogue, of M. Offenbach and his literary coadjutors. To judge by the unceasing and almost boisterous hilarity which formed a sort of running commentary on the part of the audience, Trial by Jury suffered nothing whatever from so dangerous a juxtaposition. On the contrary, it may fairly be said to have borne away the palm. Two more expert practitioners than Messrs Gilbert and Sullivan could hardly, it is true, have been invited to combine in the manufacture of so odd a piece of work—the designation of which, by the way, as "a novel and original dramatic cantata" is as strange as anything else belonging to it. About the ingenuity with which Mr Gilbert can turn to excellent purpose whatever may suggest itself to his quaintly individual fancy, those who have perused the Bab Ballads need not be reminded. On the other hand, Cox and Box and the Contrabandista, in the production of which Mr Sullivan was associated with Mr Burnand, proved his ability to cope with the most admired French composers of burlesque, while, at the same time, better provided in a strictly musical sense than any of them. A description of Mr Gilbert's piece would answer little purpose, inasmuch as it defies analysis. It is a harmless "skit" upon the adjudicature of a case for "breach of promise," in the course of which the twelve members of the Jury and the enlightened Judge himself become so fascinated with the personal attractions of the Plaintiff Angelina, that all chance for Defendant is gone at the very instant the fair deceived one makes her appearance. The upshot is that, at a crisis when the jury are unable to come to an understanding, the Judge, impatient, suddenly descending from the bench, cuts the matter short by embracing Plaintiff (Angelina nothing loth) and declaring he will marry her himself. The music of Mr Sullivan, without reference to purely artistic merits which can hardly fail to strike connoisseurs, is precisely what, under the circumstances, it should be. Composed of slighter material than that of Cox and Box, and more particularly of the Contrabandista, it is, in its way, just as good and just as effective as either. No situation has been overlooked in which the music can be made comically subservient to the dramatic purport. Mr Sullivan, in fact, has accomplished his part in the extravaganza, so happily that—to ascend some steps higher towards the Empyrean—it seems, as in the great Wagnerian operas, as though poem and music had proceeded simultaneously from one and the same brain. There is genuine humour—as for instance, in the unison chorus of the jurymen, and the clever parody on one of the most renowned finales of modern Italian Opera; and there is also melody both fluent and catching—here and there, moreover, set off by little touches in the orchestral accompaniments which reveal the experienced hand.

The performance of Trial by Jury, at the Royalty, if exhibiting occasional shortcomings which closer familiarity may help to set right, is generally good. The orchestra, however numerically limited, is for the most part efficient; while the chief characters on the stage are carefully represented. Miss Nellie Bromley is a Plaintiff engaging enough to account for the predilection of Judge and Jury in her favour; Mr F. Sullivan's impersonation of the learned and impressionable Judge deserves a special word of praise for its quiet and natural humour; Messrs W. Fisher, Hollingsworth, and Pepper doing their best as Defendant, Plaintiff's Counsellor, and Usher of the Jury. It should be added that the various costumes are exact, without caricature, and that—the appearance of the Plaintiff with a troop of bridesmaids, in bridesmaids' attire, excepted—everything is precisely what might be witnessed on such an occasion in the court at Westminster.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

The opera season began on Tuesday night at Covent Garden with Guillaume Tell, which, now that more or less competent representatives of the trying part of Arnold have been cropping up, seems once more destined to become a stock piece at Mr Gye's theatre. No amateur can be otherwise than pleased with this, for Guillaume Tell, despite its comparatively weak libretto, is, in the serious style—Moise not forgotten—Rossini's dramatic masterpiece. To enter, however, into any new details about a work so universally known and universally admired would be superfluous. As usual when Guillaume Tell is announced, the theatre was crowded; and perhaps no opera likelier to enhance the attractions of a first night could be selected. The "encore," which, in accordance with long accepted tradition, followed a very spirited performance of the familiar overture, was responded to by a repetition of the martial movement that forms its brilliant climax. Signor Vianesi, who again shares with Signor Bevignani the position of musical director, was at the conductor's desk, and our excellent violinist, Mr Carrodus, as before, at that of the "chef d'attaque." The distribution of the leading characters on the stage differed very little from the cast of recent occasions—M. Maurel impersonating the Swiss hero, Signor Marini appearing as Arnold, and Signor Bagagiolo as Walter. The combination of three such powerful voices—barytone, tenor, and bass—was of infinite importance to the concerted music in which Rossini's great work is abundantly rich, and above all gave rare effect to the magnificent trio (Act 2), when the confederates, Tell and Walter, by informing Arnold of his father's death at the command of Gessler, persuade that vacillating patriot, now no longer influenced by his love for the Austrian Mathilde, to join the cause. Perhaps M. Maurel's most successful performance—after the duet with Arnold (Act 1), in which he gave valuable support to Signor Marini—was the pathetic address to Jemmy (Mdlle Cottini) just before Tell, in obedience to the cruel mandate of Gessler (Signor Tagliafico) is about to shoot the apple from the head of his son. Here, by his tremulous accents and real feeling, M. Maurel occasionally reminded us of his accomplished countryman and type, M. Faure. Signor Marini, by power of voice and strenuous vigour of declamation, more than once conjured up reminiscences of the late Mongini, who in certain things (not altogether wisely, perhaps) he would seem to have adopted as a model. The new feature in the cast was the Mathilde of Mdlle Bianchi, who hitherto has only appeared in more or less subordinate characters, notwithstanding the good impression she created as Oscar, the Page, in Un Ballo in Maschera. That Mdlle Bianchi, though very young, is already equal to more responsible duties, was convincingly shown on Tuesday night, in this her latest and most ambitious attempt. Both in the well-known soliloquy, "Selva opaca" (Act 2), and the fine duet with Arnold, which directly follows, she exhibited genuine intelligence and feeling. Her voice is a soprano of agreeable quality, which will doubtless acquire additional strength with time and experience. Enough for the present, that the impression created by Mdlle Bianchi was in the highest degree favourable. The other small parts were allotted to Mdlle Scalchi (Eduige); Signor Sabater (the Fisherman), &c. The Tyrolienne, as always, was a pleasing incident of the third Act. About the grand choral effects, which culminate in the wonderfully dramatic scene of the meeting of the four Cantons, as about the scenery and other accessories connected with the efficient representation of this grand work, it is only necessary to add, that they were what the public have been long accustomed to at the Royal Italian Opera. The curtain descended for the last time immediately after the famous air, "Corriam" ("Suivez moi"), declaimed with appropriate energy and force by Signor Marini.

The opera on Thursday was Der Freischütz, for the first appearance of Mdlle D'Angeri; that for to-night is Un Ballo in Maschera, with a new tenor, Signor de Sanctis, as the Duke, Mdlle D'Angeri as Amelia, and Signor Graziani as Renato. More about these in our next impression. En attendant, we may state that every one was struck with the marked improvement of Mdlle D'Angeri.

ROYAL ALBERT HALL.

Passion-week and Easter-tide were alike well celebrated in the great edifice at Kensington-gore; the one by a series of performances of sacred music, the other by concerts devoted to songs and glees. When first Messrs Novello and Co. made the experiment of giving Bach's Matthew Passion, every evening during the week most suitable for its use, doubts were not unreasonably entertained as to the result. Experience has shown, however, that the managers did not reason from false premises. Year after year the Passion concerts have been repeated, till now their success is hardly a matter of question. The series just brought to an end was equally well patronised with any that went before; three performances of Bach's great work, and one of the Messiah, drawing large audiences, by whom the noble and seasonable music appeared to be thoroughly enjoyed. Both oratorios were well given under Mr Barnby's direction, and much credit is due not only to the conductor, but to the soloists, Mesdames Sherrington, Levier, and Patey, Messrs Cummings and Foli.

The two concerts held on Easter Monday had a fair share of the patronage which holiday-makers are always ready to bestow upon worthy objects, that of the afternoon being particularly well attended. Yet, though both music and artists were popular, the daylight audience failed to reach the pitch of enthusiasm becoming a festive crowd. Out of twenty-two pieces only two were encored; the honour thus bestowed falling upon Mr Lloyd's delivery of "My own, my guiding star," and Diehl's spirited song, The Mariner, to which Signor Foli's noble voice did ample justice. The other items were allowed to pass with no more than conventional acknowledgment. Yet they presented no common merit. "The Ash Grove" (Miss Wynne), "The Meeting of the Waters" and "Caller Herrin'" (Miss Sterling), Barnby's graceful song, "My summertime," and "Good bye, sweetheart" (Mr Lloyd), Stainer's "Loyal Death" (Signor Foli), a selection of favourite part-songs admirably rendered by Messrs R. Barnby, Montem Smith, Carter, Horscroft, and Winn, and organ solos by Dr Stainer, were quite able to distinguish the concert. The evening performance, in which the same artists assisted, went off more satisfactorily, the encores being eight in number. Here, too, we were face to face with a surprise. As a rule, solos enjoy a greater amount of popular favour than concerted pieces, but out of the eight encores, four were for the glees and part songs of Mr R. Barnby and his companions. The honour was well deserved, but is rarely accorded so freely even when, as in this case, both the music and its execution take high rank. Among the successful solos were, "Come into the garden, Maud," and "My pretty Jane" (Mr Lloyd), Lemmens's "Bird of Love" (Mdme Sherrington), and Loder's "Diver" (Signor Foli). Applause was liberally bestowed upon others, as upon the organ solos of Dr Stainer, who knows well how to exhibit the resources of the huge Albert Hall instrument. With this concert ended, for the present, Messrs Novello and Co.'s spirited attempt to make the great hall popular as a place of musical resort. T. E.

Last week was recognized, as usual, at the Royal Albert Hall. There were three performances of the Passion music of Bach, under the direction of Mr Barnby, the solos on Monday evening being executed by Madame Johanna Levier, Madame Patey, Mr Cummings, Signor Foli, and Mr Thurley Beale. The performance of Wednesday, like that of Monday, was of unquestionable excellence. The attendance was large and brilliant, and the fine music of the great master was listened to with all the attention due to its religious importance and to the improved interest now taken in its technical peculiarities—thanks to the repeated hearings which the public have had the opportunity of enjoying. Since the foundation of the Bach Society by the late Sir William Sterndale Bennett, and its first performance at St Martin's Hall in 1858, the St Matthew section has been gradually, if slowly, growing in favour, and has now (thanks to Mr Joseph Barnby), become irrevocably identified with this special period of the year, and adopted more or less in its penitential services. The present Albert Hall version is the one prepared by Barnby himself. The necessary omissions have been made with care and judgment, so that the entire performance may be brought within reasonable limits. The choral singing on Wednesday night was all that could be wished. Seldom have the chorales been delivered with greater breadth, richness, and delicacy, and little need is their to say how impressive these magnificent apostrophes are when rendered by fitting numbers and in a devotional spirit. This is well understood, for it is in these congregational passages that the popularity of the Passion music chiefly lies. The whole of the choral parts were, however, nobly given, and the majestic force of those intervening bursts which represent the public voice in the sacred story, was felt in all its dramatic intensity, and realised to the utmost the momentous grandeur of the scene. The solo vocalists were not wholly those of Monday night. Mdme Lemmens-Sherrington replaced Mdlle Johanna Levier; and Miss Done, Mdme Patey. The first-mentioned lady sang, as is her wont, with consummate skill, while the second again gave proof of many commendable qualifications as a contralto. Mr W. H. Cummings's interpretation of the tenor recitatives was, in every respect, faultless. The simple narrative of the Evangelist could not possibly have been told with more graceful tenderness; while the delivery of the few words which describe the remorse of Peter was a perfect example of declamatory art. The two bass parts, as upon the former occasion, were allotted to Signor Foli and Mr Thurley Beale. The pianoforte accompaniment of the recitatives fell as usual into the all-sufficient hands of Mr Randegger; and the privilege of playing the violin obbligato in the contralto air "Have mercy upon me," was enjoyed by the accomplished Mr Pollitzer. Dr Stainer presided with his accustomed excellence at the organ.

THE HASSKEUI MINSTRELS.

(From the "Levant Herald" of March 19.)

Want of space has prevented our noticing until to-day the performance of the Hasskeui Minstrels, given on Saturday evening in the great hall of the Teutonia Club, under the patronage of Sir Philip Francis, in aid of the Famine Fund. This amateur troupe consists of Mr Tucker, its organizer and director, and six other gentlemen—Messrs Watkins, Till, Blair, W. Blair, Wetherilt, and Beith. All are functionaries in the engineering department of the Arsenal, and on this occasion gave substantial proof of their charitable sentiments and deep interest in the misfortunes which afflict the country they serve. With infinite pains they got up an entertainment, not only highly creditable in an artistic point of view, but carried off with so much vivacity that the audience, who had paid close upon £150 to hear it, enjoyed it heartily. The room, spacious and well lighted, the use of which the Teutonia Club had gratuitously placed at the disposal of the performers, afforded them a fair field for the exhibition of their talents, and contributed in no small degree to their success. Among the audience were Lady Elliot and Miss Elliot, Lady Francis, the Hon. Mrs Hobart, Miss Foster, and other leading members of the British colony. The evident pains bestowed to render the entertainment complete in every detail reflected great credit on Mr Tucker and his worthy band. Amateur performances generally show weakness in detail, but the "Minstrels" were of opinion that if a thing is worth doing it is worth doing well, and the concert bore the impress of that opinion.

CASSEL.—The Intendant of the Theatre Royal has received notification that the annual sum of 108,000 marks, paid out of the sequestrated estates of the late Elector, will continue until further notice. The grant from the Royal Privy purse, amounting in 1867 to hardly 25,000 marks, is estimated for 1875 at 93,000 marks, exclusive of sums for building and alterations. The expenses have doubled in the last seven years. For this year they exceed 465,000 marks.

PITTSBURG (America).—Mrs Scott Siddons has given one of her delightful "readings" at the Library Hall, which attracted a large audience. The "Maniac," "The Jackdaw of Rheims," and Hood's "Bridge of Sighs" were especially successful. Mrs Siddons was "assisted" by Master Henry Walker (known as Seraphael), who—says the Pittsburg Gazette of February 24—gave satisfactory evidence that for once, at least, a new sensation had not been overrated. The young pianist, who seems not to have lost the modesty of a child, plays with marvellous skill and beauty, and entirely from memory. The audience manifested their appreciation by rapturous "encores," and were not satisfied until he had played three pieces in succession.

MARRIAGE.

On Easter Sunday, in the Savoy Chapel Royal, Mr JOHN MCKINLAY, of Perthshire and New York State, to Miss ANTOINETTE STERLING.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

INDAGATOR.—We have no room for the letter of our correspondent; but we can supply him with the information he asks for with regard to the pianoforte trios of Mozart. The order of their production was as follows:—No. 1, in B flat, composed at Salzburg (1776); No. 2, in D minor and major (1783); No. 3, in G major (1786—the year of Le Nozze di Figaro); No. 4, in E flat, at Vienna (1786); No. 5, in B flat, at Vienna (1786); No. 6, in E major, at Vienna (1788); No. 7, in C major, at Vienna (1788); and No. 8, in G major, at Vienna (1788). The No. 8, in G, had been composed earlier, for pianoforte solus.

LAVENDER PITT.—No; the composer has left it to the feeling and discretion of the performer. Gradation of tone is one of the principal charms of legitimate playing. Listen to "J. J." in the chaconne—what variety he imparts to it, and thus avoids monotony. The second theme (of a different character from the first)— is a cantabile; and the tributary to the first should be legato. More "nuances" everywhere imperative.

The Musical World,

LONDON, SATURDAY, APRIL 3, 1875.

LOHENGRIN, &c.

Wiesbaden, the 30th March, 1875.

MR DUNCAN DAVISON
(London).

SIR,—Referring to my correspondents, Messrs Brandus and Co., Paris, I beg to invite you by the present to see Mr Wolf (Schott and Co., 159, Regent Street), in order to be instructed of my wishes concs. the performances of Richard Wagner's

"LOHENGRIN"

(and other works of the same composer), publically announced by Mr Mapleson and by Mr Gye, though none of these both has ever been authorized, the work itself being registered at Stationers' Hall.

You are, I suppose, acquainted with the two aforenamed managers, and might be able to fix the position by a "treaty," by which the assignee of Wagner (myself) is not forced to a legal proceeding of much expense, in want of recognition of his rights of performance. Meanwhile, I remain, your most obedient, CARL W. BAG.

—o—

THE part of Mr Mapleson's prospectus which will receive most attention is that wherein we are told something about the proposed new Opera House on the Thames Embankment. Enterprises of the kind have been so often projected, and talked about as certain to be carried through, without result, that Mr Mapleson's reference to the new theatre as "in course of construction" brings its own welcome. This is not exactly the place for speculation with regard to the affair. There will be time enough to discuss it in all its bearings; but, at any rate, we can express the sympathy with which most people look upon the efforts of Mr Mapleson to establish Her Majesty's Opera in its proper position.

Turning to promises for the season, which begins next Saturday with Fidelio, we find that, as regards additions to his repertory, Mr Mapleson intends keeping pace with Mr Gye. He, too, bids us look for Lohengrin, and talks of new dresses, scenery, and appointments, on a scale adequate to the requirements of that exacting work. Better still, he has "cast" the opera in such a way that it would be unreasonable to desire anything better. With Mdme Nilsson as Elsa, Mdlle Tietjens as Ortrud, and Signor Campanini as Lohengrin, the performance should be—cannot fail to be—one of rare interest. Wagner's masterpiece, as many style it, will, of course, be the great event of the season, and, should it turn out successful, we may dismiss the other promised novelties from consideration. In any case, it is not likely that the Marquis d'Ivry's Amanti di Verona will have a hearing at present. The production of two strange operas entails such an expenditure, and involves so serious a risk, that it would be unreasonable to expect any manager to set about the task. Balfe's Talismano will duly reappear after its round of the provinces, and many other works of interest are specified as likely to make their rentrées. But we are most concerned to note the experiment by which Mr Mapleson will test the real musical status of his patrons. He declares his intention to play one classic opera each week, and thus devote a quarter of the season to such masterpieces as Fidelio, Medea, and Don Giovanni. The proportion is not too much, having regard to the claims of the works; but it remains to be seen whether the public will make Mr Mapleson's enterprise remunerative. We hope, and are almost disposed to believe, that they will; but, at all events, none can say, in future, that classic opera has not been formally put upon its trial.

Mr Mapleson's new artists are to us names only, though report speaks in strong terms of Mdlle Varesi. This being so, it will be better to wait the result of their début than to indulge in speculations which might mislead. By death the manager has lost from the ranks of his "old guard" Mr Perkins and Signor Agnesi; but most of the others remain. He is again rich in the possession of Mdlle Tietjens and Mdme Nilsson—each a host in herself; Mdme Trebelli, Signor Campanini, and Herr Behrens will once more do excellent service; while, with such a band and chorus as that over which Sir M. Costa presides, the ensemble can hardly fail to give satisfaction. On the whole, the prospects of Her Majesty's Opera are encouraging, and inspire confidence as to the result.

—o—

THE Musical Times has taken up, on public grounds, the question of doubtful musical degrees, and given insertion to a letter, in which Dr Stainer asks Mr Thomas Lloyd Fowle (Mus. Doc., M.A.) to explain whence and how he obtained the honours we have put in parenthesis. Mr Fowle replies in our contemporary's issue for the present month, not by answering the questions, but by catechising his catechist. Therein Mr Fowle, assuming him to have no cause for shame connected with his titles, does wrong. When one of a company is suspected, the innocent make no difficulty about investigation, but rather solicit that course, in justice to themselves. Mr Fowle objects to be examined for reasons strong enough to make the consequent suspicion a secondary matter. Doubtless, he knows the actual circumstances better than ourselves; but, to a looker on, his conduct appears, at least, injudicious. The matter of his reply to Dr Stainer is worth a few observations. In the first place, he will answer Dr Stainer's queries, provided Dr Stainer himself submits to a previous examination. Mr Fowle wants to know five things. First,—How did Dr Stainer obtain the organist's place at St Paul's without competition? Second,—Does Dr Stainer think it a proper act

to exclude eminent men by non-competition? Third,—Does not Dr Stainer already know where Mr Fowle (Mus. Doc., M.A.) obtained his degrees, and is he not jealous? Fourth,—Does Dr Stainer think it professional and gentlemanly to ask such questions in a public manner? Fifth,—Has not Dr Stainer attacked Mr Fowle on the same subject at a former time, and anonymously; and has he not spoken or written to a printer who once libelled Mr Fowle, and was mulcted in damages? Having thus extended the area of a very simple inquiry, the writer turns upon the Editor of the Musical Times, and gives him a "bit of his mind," in the most undisguised fashion, winding up with a statement that he is profoundly indifferent about the printing of his letter in that journal, seeing it will be printed somehow, and somehow dispersed through all the "towns and villages of the United Kingdom." The fearful threat of having Stoke Pogis roused against him naturally led our contemporary's editor to resolve upon giving Mr Fowle's letter to the world; but Mr Fowle, who knew more about the value of his own bellicosity, fancied something stronger would be needed, and, therefore, hurried a P.S. after the chief missive. The P.S. said:—

"I think it well to caution you as to what you insert in your journal about my degrees, as undeniable proof can be given of their bonâ fide nature. A few years ago a contemporary only escaped an action for libel by printing an account of them in extenso, and I am determined if anything further is inserted that is false and libellous I will prosecute to the utmost rigour of the law. I therefore warn you to be careful what you insert. I can say much on the subject of degrees with which you and your readers do not appear to be familiar."

Need it be recorded that a postscript in so Erclesian a vein overshot its mark, and forced our contemporary to say that nothing save "straightforward replies" to Dr Stainer's questions would thereafter receive attention?

Meanwhile, Dr Stainer had read Mr Fowle's letter, and his rejoinder appears in company with it. The organist of St Paul's does not object to be catechised. He answers briefly, but sufficiently, the whole of the five queries addressed to him from Winchester, and, having done so, calls upon Mr Fowle to complete his share of an agreement which he (Mr Fowle) himself proposed. This, of course, will be done, and, next month, an expectant public will know from what University Dr Fowle, M.A., obtained his honours. With this information everybody will be satisfied; but Mr Fowle might have saved a great deal of bother by giving the needed particulars at once, and he has only himself to thank for the suspicions aroused. An honest man, who is stopped by a policeman when carrying home his own property at dead of night, does not, if he be also a wise man, ask the officer to show his baptismal certificate and whether he was not once seen talking to a cook down the "airy." Rather does he assure the nocturnal guardian of his distinguished consideration for so much vigilance. If Mr Fowle's degrees are bonâ fide—and he protests that they are—it is his interest to help others in putting down spurious ones, not to meet their efforts with abuse. Here we leave the matter, and await the Fowle revelation, due on May Day next.

SIGNOR SALVINI, the greatest of living Italian tragedians, made his first appearance before an English audience on Thursday night. The play was Othello. Salvini was, of course, the hero; and we may say, without hesitation, that no such dramatic embodiment of Shakspere's magnificent creation has been witnessed in our time.

Paper.

". . . A handmaid and messenger of Memory.
A recorder of the aspirations of Genius."

(From "Another World.")

The colour principally in use is that of cream or a very light yellow; for, though we can produce a chalky white, we do not use it in our stuffs, except for linen.

There is a paper which we call "natural," because its green colour exceptionally resembles that of the leaf, although it is purely artificial, being produced by the use of a powder obtained from a particular fruit which hangs from a tree in the shape of small eggs, and contains a white powder of a sticky consistency. This powder is mixed with the leaves, and the paper thus prepared is very transparent. At first it has a kind of primrose tint, but, when subjected to heat, or to the sun, turns green. The egg called "Brulista Tavi," or "Lime Egg," follows a small blossom, but the fruit alone is used. The trees are plentiful, growing on marshy ground, a long distance from the city, for there are no marshes in its vicinity.

Golden-coloured Paper.

Some paper is of a pure gold-colour, the result of a property inherent in the leaf itself, and needing no extraneous application.

I have told you that the coarse paper is made with leaves of every description mixed together. On one occasion, some of the paper, when dried, became speckled with gold in different parts, presenting a beautiful appearance, which astonished the overseer and workmen. The paper was brought to me, and I directed the overseer to endeavour to detect in future processes the cause of these beautiful specks. Many trials were made, but he did not for months find any gold in the paper.

I meditated much on the subject, and one night I retired to rest with the singular phenomenon still in my mind. In my sleep I saw my tree, the Allmanyuka, all gold.

On awaking I immediately sent for the overseer, and, without relating what I had seen in my sleep, I told him that I was impressed with the belief that it was the leaf of my tree that produced the gold specks, and requested him to have some paper made entirely from the Allmanyuka leaf, and to use the most delicate machine for the experiment.

Though accustomed to obey my orders in implicit faith, the overseer confessed to me afterwards that for certain reasons he had great cause to doubt whether the experiment would succeed. It, however, was commenced without delay. The pulp, or jelly, after having passed through the process of boiling, was of a neutral tint, without the least appearance of gold, and all hope of the desired colour vanished in the thought of the workmen. It was, indeed, reported to me that no golden tint was apparent; but I did not yet despair.

When the pulp was spread out with the trowel, it remained still colourless, but after it had undergone the process of pressing, which generally took place immediately before sponging, it presented to the astonished workmen the appearance of one sheet of gold; and when it had been exposed to the sun it acquired the highest polish possible.

The material thus obtained is finer than cambric, and is used for beautiful scarfs, sun-turbans, neckties for ladies, slippers, covers, cushions, and various ornamental articles.

OCCASIONAL NOTES.

On the morning of Easter Sunday a marriage was solemnized in the Chapel Royal, Savoy, between Mr John McKinlay and Miss Antoinette Sterling. The wedding service was celebrated by the Rev. Henry White, Chaplain-in-Ordinary to the Queen. The musical portions of the service were executed by the Savoy choir, and directed by Mr H. F. Frost, the organist. The bride was given away by Dr George Macdonald, at whose house the bridal party was subsequently entertained. The newly-married couple and their friends remained for the Holy Communion at the usual mid-day service.

We read the following in the Ménestrel of Paris:—

"As Paris does not possess a third lyric theatre, the new directors of the Monnaie, Brussels, MM. Stoumon and Calabrési, intend placing their theatre at the disposal of French musicians, for the production of untried operas. Moreover, French critics are to be invited to first performances (!). The idea is generous, and may be fertile in results. What we want in Paris is a theatre for débuts."

Professor Cesare Mires may lay claim to be considered a public benefactor. He has invented an instrument, similar in form to the violin, on which students of that instrument may practise without a sound being heard beyond the limits of their own room. This humanitarian invention will be largely purchased, even by those not desirous of becoming violinists themselves, as a present to any neighbour who is. Professor Mires may one day hit upon something of the kind applicable to the piano.

There has just died at Saint-Sever (Calvados), ignored by the world, an artist who once enjoyed popularity and even celebrity. This was Lemonnier, formerly tenor at the Opéra-Comique, who married Regnault, of the same theatre, rival of Duret-Saint-Aubin. Lemonnier, born in 1793, began his career as a mere "enfant," at the Théâtre des Jeunes Artistes. When this was shut, with others, in consequence of the Imperial decree of 1807, he was thrown out of employment. But at Rouen, and Brussels, he was afterwards engaged expressly for the "Colins." On the 5th May, 1817, he made his début at the Opéra-Comique, his "trial parts" being the Chevalier (Jeannot et Colin) and Paul (Paul et Virginie). His voice was small, but he was good-looking as well as young, and, moreover, an excellent actor. Lemonnier was the original of important characters in Les deux Mousquetaires, Le Pré-aux-Clercs, Les deux Nuits, and other operas. He retired about 1834, and resided at St Sever, where he died on the 4th March, aged eighty-two, having survived his wife four or five years. His son was Crown Jeweller, under the second Empire.

Mdlle Zaré Thalberg, Mr Gye's new prima donna, has arrived in London. She is, we understand, to make her début as Zerlina, in Don Giovanni.

The Sacred Harmonic Society give a performance of Handel's Israel in Egypt on Friday next, the 9th inst., with Madame Corani, Madame Patey, Mr Sims Reeves, Signor Foli, and Mr Lewis Thomas as principal vocalists. Sir Michael Costa will conduct.

Venice (Extract from a Letter).—"The season at the Fenice closed brilliantly, with an admirable performance of Signor Schira's Selvaggia, which has made quite a sensation here, and will cause the operatic session of 1875 to be remembered among us Venetians, who now but too seldom get anything which is not only new, but, at the same time, good. The part of Laudomia was sustained by Mdlle Proch (who, I am informed, is engaged for Covent Garden, by Mr Gye). She created a genuine effect, and was received with enthusiasm. 'Ebbe applausi quanto la De Steschi, facendole ripetere la sua canzone, e gettandole una quantità di maggi di fiori.' I am told that, for the gala night, before the Emperor of Austria and the King of Italy, the director of the London Royal Italian Opera has given the services of the richly-endowed and charming Emma Albani, who is to appear as Lucia di Lammermoor on the memorable occasion. Entre nous—I think the Cavaliero Schira was ill advised in leaving Venice after the third performance of his Selvaggia. Had he remained until the end of the season he would have had a regular ovation. "A. L. P."

CONCERT.

Mr F. H. Bellew, the new baritone, gave an evening concert on Saturday, March 27, in St George's Hall, Langham Place, which proved a great success. Mr Bellew (who is a pupil of Ch. J. Bishenden) made his first appearance in public on this occasion, "previous to his departure on a tour with the Liston Opera Company." He succeeded in gaining two encores—for "The Rhine Wine," and for an air from Les Prés St Gervais; Miss Estelle Emrick sang "The Raft," and Gounod's "Quando a te liete," &c., with great taste Miss Kate Sullivan's songs were much admired, and Mr Bishenden was encored in "Hearts of Oak," and in "The Friar of Orders Grey," the audience being very enthusiastic. Mdlle De Lucie and Miss F. Sanders were the pianists; Herr Schuberth and Mr W. C. Levey accompanied the songs, and the former played two violoncello solos in his most brilliant style.

PROVINCIAL.

Malvern.—Dr Hans von Bülow, the celebrated pianist, gave a pianoforte recital at the Concert-room on Friday afternoon last. There was a crowded and fashionable attendance, many coming to hear the Doctor from Worcester, Ledbury, Malvern Wells, &c., and they had a rare musical treat. Dr von Bulow selects some of the most difficult classical music, which he plays with exquisite taste and expression with the greatest ease, and all without music before him. The Doctor's study of the works he undertakes is profound, and his energies are exclusively directed to the interpretation of the composer's ideas. The programme comprised selections from Bach, Handel, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Chopin, and Liszt. The pianoforte was a magnificent "iron concert grand," sent down expressly by Messrs John Broadwood and Sons. Dr von Bülow was warmly applauded at the conclusion of each performance, and the musical inhabitants should give their hearty support to Mr Haynes for inducing such highly talented musicians to visit Malvern.—Malvern News, March 27.

MUSIC IN MANCHESTER.

(From our Correspondent.)

Last week Mr Mapleson's company appeared at the Queen's Theatre, and gave three performances; Il Barbiere, Rigoletto, and Der Freischütz, being the operas—selected, I was going to say—but, as Il Barbiere was given suddenly, instead of Semiramide, the word will scarcely be applicable. The cause of the withdrawal of Semiramide was the inability of Mdlle Tietjens to conquer a sudden hoarseness. Happily, the indisposition of this popular artist was only temporary, as she sang on Wednesday evening, the last night of the engagement of the company, in Der Freischütz, with her accustomed vigour, and, as usual, roused the audience to enthusiasm by her fine singing of "Softly sighs." In Rigoletto, on the Tuesday evening, two new singers appeared. Mdlle Pernini, the Gilda of the evening, has a soprano voice of considerable sweetness and purity, especially in the upper range; her lower notes are not very powerful, but she sings like an artist, and has apparently been accustomed to the stage. Of Signor Bignardi, the new tenor, I can say but little. He must, however, be very good-natured, or he would not have risked his reputation by singing when scarcely able to make himself heard. In Der Freischütz, however, though still very hoarse, he was heard to greater advantage, and gave the impression that he was an experienced singer and a musician. He acts well, and has a good stage presence. Signor Galassi, as Rigoletto, was remarkably successful; and Mdlle Bauermeister, as Annetta in Der Freischütz, surprised the audience by the admirable manner in which she sang the music of the part.

Last week, M. Rivière commenced his second series of Promenade Concerts at the Prince's Theatre. He has engaged an excellent orchestra, which includes several soloists of great ability. There is also choral music every night, and occasionally military music. The list of solo singers who have appeared, or will appear during the engagement, includes the names of Miss Blanche Cole, Miss Enriquez, Mdme Poole, Mr George Perren, Mr Wadmore, &c.—and also some singers whose names are new to Manchester. The programmes have been interesting and varied, and, as the arrangements in the theatre for promenading are admirable, M. Rivière has the right to expect a prosperous season.

Pesth.—A new opera—The Boyard's Daughter, by Madlle Ella Wajewsky—has been accepted at the Hungarian National Theatre.

RICHARD WAGNER AND THE VIENNESE.

(Communicated.)

The Concert for the Benefit of the Bayreuth Stage-Festival-Play-House (we do not know whether the appellation is Wagnerially orthodox) has been repeated under the direction of the composer. The attendance was again exceedingly great, and the applause unusually lively after the passages comprehensible by human intelligence, and in keeping with human feeling for the Beautiful. The stilted and eccentrically artificial character of these musical fragments fatigues and irritates one, as do all Wagner's caprices; consequently, when a harmonious passage, after long brooding and wailing, at last succeeds in struggling forth out of the seething chaos, it is as refreshing as a draught of water after a toilsome ride through the hot sands of the desert. Sincere thanks and applause are then bestowed upon the composer, who has cleverly prepared and held in readiness such moments of deliverance. This was the case at the first and at the second Wagner concert; the unmeaning and noisy shouting, the frantic stamping and clapping, for a quarter of an hour at a time, till the master, moved by the manifestation, again appears, and again condescends to do us the favour of addressing us—all these turbulent ovations proceed, not from the great mass of the public, but from an organized clique, who have constantly dealt in the most ridiculous Wagner-enthusiasm, and, like satellites, hang on the famous composer, because, without him they would inevitably vegetate in wretched obscurity. Such is the view taken of the matter by an outsider, who, entirely free from prejudice, can reckon up the ecstatic raptures of these Wagnerites, and also see behind the scenes, whence come the astoundingly gigantic laurel wreaths. To drag these into the room, and shower them down at the conclusion of the concert, is something no ordinary lover of music would ever think of doing, because the concerts cost quite enough without any additional outlay, and because, after listening with painful effort and small enjoyment for two hours, people are glad to get out into the open air. The success may prove greater and more permanent when the opera is represented on the stage; yesterday it was what we have described it. We must mention, likewise, that, in a short concluding speech, Wagner expressed his thanks, and graciously half consented to come again. There is, in fact, a report that he will have the goodness to return here this very month, to carry off a further sum of from eight to ten thousand florins for his Stage-Festival-Play-House. With Mad. Materna and Herr Labatt, the vocalists, he was unusually amiable; after the first round of applause, he took them by the hand and led them to the front. B.

A Song.

(For Music.)

Wreathe red roses in my hair,
Strew their blossoms everywhere;
If you tell me 'tis too soon—
Roses do not blow till June;
Bring me onions, lettuce, rue—
Anything, in short, will do.

Let me bind your forehead thus
With the gay asparagus,
Let glad radishes combine
With the beetroot's crimson twine,
And let Brussels' sprouts outvie
Blossoms of the brocoli.

Add beside, at my request,
Dandelions to the rest;
Wreaths and garlands thus we bring
As the harbingers of spring.
And when we have done our ballad,
We can make them into salad.

DARMSTADT.—At a recent sitting, the Second Chamber was asked by the Government to grant, towards rebuilding the Grand Ducal Theatre, 691,200 marks from the State funds, and 172,000 marks from other sources, besides a further sum of 160,878 marks towards erecting scene rooms and a residence for the master carpenter.

MUSICAL ASSOCIATION.

At the monthly meeting held recently in the Beethoven Rooms—Dr Pole, F.R.S., in the chair—the following paper was read by Mr John Hullah:—I propose in this address to deal with certain names or terms and epithets in use among English musicians. Many of these it is certain have outlived the ideas or things for which they once stood; others now represent to all of us ideas and things different from those they once represented. The time seems to have arrived when we should come to an understanding as to our musical nomenclature. It will not, I think, be found necessary to make any addition to it; at any rate I have none to propose to you to-day. But I shall simply ask you to consider, and, if possible, to decide which, out of many names or terms representing, and epithets qualifying the same thing, it is desirable to adopt or recommend for adoption. Musical nomenclature has reference of necessity to time, to tune, and to expression. I will deal with its application to these separately. Under the head of time, let us first consider the duration names of musical notes. Those which at present concern us are breve, semibreve, minim, crotchet, quaver, semiquaver, and demisemiquaver. Of these names, the first three have altogether lost their significance; the fourth is no longer appropriate, the fifth, sixth, and seventh are arbitrary. The breve is no longer short, but unusually long; the minim is not now the least or shortest, but not unfrequently the greatest or longest; the crotchet has now no crotch or hook; and the quaver and the fractions might just as well be called the shiver, the half-shiver, and the quarter-shiver, or by any other names as fantastic or irrelative. The Germans call these notes, beginning from our semibreve, the whole-note, the half-note, the quarter-note, and so on. These appellations, so far as they express the proportion of the first note named to those which follow it, are convenient. They form of themselves a time-table, but it is an imperfect one, for they do not show, without further calculation any intermediate proportions. They shew at once that eight quavers equal one semibreve, but not at once that four quavers equal one minim. But I have a much more serious charge to bring against them. They assume what, if not always false, is, as it seems to me, not always true, that the semibreve is, or that any form of note can be, absolutely a whole note. What is or what should be regarded as a whole note? If I were sure that the word phrase represented to all of us the same idea as it does to me, I should answer unhesitatingly that a whole note was any note that could be divided into a phrase, or to be a little more precise, any note, divided or undivided, which would fill either an entire measure or require as many beats as would make one. This would give us practically four claimants to the title of whole note; the breve, the average whole note of the sixteenth century; the semibreve, the average whole note of our own time; the minim, and even the crotchet. For that movements innumerable of four times a beat in a measure, each of which is a quaver, exist I need not say, nor that the measure even of four semiquavers has been occasionally employed. It is certain that a sound lasting four beats may be expressed, and has been expressed, by six different forms—the maxim, the long, the breve, the semibreve, the minim, and the crotchet. Perhaps some musician of the future may think proper to express such a note by a quaver. Let us now consider the names used by the French, a people possessing in high perfection the power of clear exposition of what they themselves see clearly. As usual, they leave or throw on one side whatever they regard as uncertain or equivocal, or not commonly accepted, and proceed to deal with the undisputed and indisputable facts or portions of facts before them. And what are these in respect to the forms which express the relative durations of sound? First, that they are forms; and secondly, that they are different forms—that one is an oval or circle, that another is a circle with a stem, and another a circular spot, also with a stem; and that all other notes are opaque and have not only stems, but hooks varying in number. They call these notes or forms as they find them—round, white, black, hooked, twice hooked, and thrice hooked. I certainly prefer the German nomenclature—which, though raised on a false basis, is consistent—to our own, which is inconsistent as well as false; but I prefer the French to the German, because, not pretending to do so much, it does what it pretends to do perfectly.

On the pitch names of notes—A, B, Do, Re, or what not—I do not propose to speak to-day. Perhaps on some future occasion you will allow me to bring some considerations about them before you. I pass on at once to another matter relating to the second division of our subject—tune, the nomenclature not of sounds, but of the relations between them—the nomenclature of musical intervals, on which English theorists and practitioners are by no means agreed. I believe that the seconds and thirds, and their inversions, the sevenths and sixths, found in the so-called "natural" scale, and all scales made like it, are very generally called among us major and minor; and that six of the fourths and their inversions the fifths are as generally called perfect. Here, however, agreement ends. For the one exceptional fourth and the one exceptional fifth rejoice each in as many aliases as a swindler finally run down by the detective police. To the exceptional fourth, which, according to the old theorists' "diabolus est" I have heard and seen applied the name "tritone," and the epithets sharp, superfluous, redundant, and augmented; to the exceptional fifth, the epithets flat, false, imperfect, diminished, and equivocal. Others might possibly be added to this list. To the name "tritone," no objection is, I think, open. It expresses the contents of the interval—three tones; but it carries with it the disadvantage of there being no corresponding name for its inversion, the exceptional fifth. Augmented and diminished are no doubt autonyms, but both are epithets which, as I shall try to show, ought to be reserved exclusively for another class of intervals—the chromatic. Superfluous and redundant are, I think, clumsy epithets; but if either is to be applied to the exceptional fourth, its autonymal, scanty, or insufficient, should be applied to the exceptional fifth. If this last interval is to be called false, its inversion (the tritone) should be called true. Only one of these epithets seems to me quite unobjectionable—imperfect, as applied to the exceptional fifth. As an autonym to this, I have long used the epithet pluperfect, which has been very largely adopted.

THE SONG OF THE BIRD.

(Copyright.)

Up in the leafy wilderness
Of a tall and branching elm,
A bird trilled forth with tenderness
His soul in that verdant realm.
I listened, amid the pattering rain,
All his melody to hear,
'Till to mine ear the words seemed plain
That he carolled out so clear.

"Ah! who would not be
A bird like to me,
As I pipe my lay
So joyous and gay,
And float in the air—
Such a pastime rare;
Or, in circling chase,
With my comrades race,
By meadow and brook,
And in sunny nook;
Then chirrup and play
All the summer day,
'Till down in the west,
When the sun doth rest,
To our nests we flee
In the leafy tree,
And sing until night,
And the fading light,
In mantle of sleep
All the world shall keep.
For happy is earth,
With freedom and mirth;
With sunshine and flowers,
'Mid the sylvan bowers,
Where we hold our court,
All caring for naught,
But the joy of the passing hours."

FINLAY FINLAYSON.

THE PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

(From an Occasional Contributor.)

The Philharmonic Society of London commenced its sixty-third season on the evening of the 18th inst., under circumstances of peculiar but melancholy interest. While the effects of tears so recently shed are continuing, one of the most important works of him whose rather unexpected death occasioned them (The Woman of Samaria), is performed, and in a manner scarcely open to criticism. The friends of a memory loved more than in an ordinary way assembled, at St James's Hall, to hear some of the greatest outpourings of the genius of one whom generations will regard as among the brightest to which England has given birth. Many a heart in the hall on this occasion throbbed with unusual beatings by reason of numberless associations conjured up in connection with the life of Sir Sterndale Bennett, now brought to a close. These beatings were augmented by a few circumstances. All the ladies in the orchestra who were to take part in the performance were clad in black, proclaiming how they felt England's loss; and each wore the red scarf, denoting that they all were students at the Royal Academy of Music, over which the great musician, and the good and gentle man presided. This sight alone engendered sadness. Facing the orchestra was the portrait (lent for the occasion by R. Case, Esq.), painted by Millais, of the composer wearing his Cambridge robes; and in the front of the orchestra, where on Philharmonic nights is placed usually the representation of the massive brow of the writer of the 9th Symphony, was Signor Trentanove's bust of the recently buried musician, by rendering homage to the memory of whom England now honours herself, and proclaims to the musical continent, not only that she can give birth to, but that she can duly appreciate, a great man—great in an art which till comparatively recently was almost ignored in this country, as being unworthy of national consideration. Many listeners had numerous circumstances of their life brought to their recollection, as not a few present were more or less associated with Sterndale Bennett when he was a student; not a few, when he was a player, charming with the extreme delicacy of his touch, and making the very chords of the listener's heart to vibrate, so sympathetic was the feeling he displayed; and not a few, when he returned from Germany with the laurel crown upon his head of the blessing of Schumann and Mendelssohn: and finally not a few, when England's chief Musical Society offered him its direction. To write the history of one great man is to bring to light much of the history, and many of the circumstances of others, and sometimes a portion of the life of the nation to which the one great man belonged. Thus, in having the salient points in the career of Sterndale Bennett brought to our recollection at this emotional concert, the gray-haired man thinks of times gone by, and the strong man in the prime of life looks through the vista of years and is a boy again, though, instead of the bright hope of those days being his now, the sorrows through which he has passed, resulting from disappointment or some other cause, make the retrospection one of sadness.

The first part of the programme comprised the orchestral prelude to Sophocles's Ajax, the funeral march for the burial of the Warrior (first time of performance), and the Woman of Samaria. The first two will certainly rank among the author's very finest productions. A better performance of the sacred Cantata, with hardly an exception, could not have been desired. The peculiar melodic inflexions of the recitatives, and even of some of the airs, tell the gifted man who thought them, and are in truth so many photographs (if the expression may be allowed), of some of his inner feelings; and, while it may be admitted they do not carry the hearer away at first, they win upon him in an insensible manner, their peculiar beauty insinuating itself until the most prepossessed listener in favour of other forms is compelled to bend beneath their fascinating power.

It may be almost assumed that the unaccompanied quartet, "God is a spirit," will ever be regarded as the gem of the work. Other numbers may be contrasted with specimens of like kinds, and judgment may be doubtful, for reasons not now to be adduced. But this quartet, compared with any example, cannot suffer: its peculiar lustre can never be dimmed. On this occasion it was rendered in a perfect manner, and was enthusiastically encored. No man who heard it, if he assisted at the funeral of the composer, could fail to remember its previous rendering in our grand Abbey, when its echoes, vibrating through the vaulted roof, whereby its delicate harmonies seemed etherealized, were as a voice from the skies, sent to instruct us mortals that he who composed it had been summoned to join the immortal choir, while all that remained of him was being tearfully and tenderly placed by the side of kindred spirits, long gone to their rest, whose glorious music rises daily from that ancient shrine like perfumed incense reaching unto heaven.—F. FUNERAL OF MR LIMPUS.

On Saturday the funeral of Mr R. D. Limpus, founder of the College Organists, organist and choirmaster of St Michael's, Cornhill, took place at Norwood Cemetery. A choral rendering of the first portion of the service, with special anthems, had been arranged by Dr Stainer and other members of the college at St Michael's, but at the last moment the churchwardens refused to allow the church to be used for this purpose; it was therefore given at St George, the Martyr, Queen Square, by the members of the college, with a choir of picked voices. The family of the Rev. T. W. Wrench, rector of St Michael's, testified respect by their presence at St George's, with many more of the congregation of St Michael's. The service at the grave was read by the Rev. W. Hunt, Sunday evening lecturer. Around the grave where assembled the Rev. Canon Limpus, vicar of Twickenham, chief mourner, Drs Stainer and Steggall, Messrs Edwards, Gilbert, C. E. Stevens, Miller, Turpin, Lott, Jordan, Webster, Westley, Wiggins, and many others of the College of Organists, together with Masonic and other friends, including the choir boys of St Michael's, Cornhill.

ITALIAN OPERA IN VIENNA.

The Italian season was opened at the Komische Oper with Lucia. Mad. Patti was received with a tempest of applause. Her voice has not lost a single ray of its fire and brilliancy, since we last heard it in Vienna. On the other hand, it seems to have gained in intensity. This, and her vocal skill, which we can never sufficiently admire, combined with the charm of her interesting personal appearance, obtained yesterday for the fair and celebrated singer an innumerable series of recalls and a long succession of triumphs. M. Gayarre, as Edgardo, was in good voice, while his singing and acting were full of vigour. Sig. Rota, barytone, was new to us; he sustained the part of Asthon. His voice is so high and clear that we can hardly fix the limit where the tenor ends and the bass begins. His style is sober and effective. The lively, energetic, and fiery Arditi again occupied the conductor's seat, and the orchestra went admirably. In obedience to a stormy outburst of applause, the sextet in the second act was repeated, and, after the mad scene in the third act, the public were simply worked up to a state of frenzy.—Neue Wiener-Tageblatt.

MILAN.—Sig. Ponchielli's opera, I Lituani, has proved a hit at the Scala.—L'Africaine is announced at the Teatro dal Verme; and the Teatro Castelli will ere long be opened with Cagnoni's Duca di Tapigliano.

VENICE.—Der Freischütz was performed lately at the Teatro Fenice, for the first time.—The Teatro Apollo is now called the Teatro Goldoni. The alteration was effected with great ceremony, and the receipts of the performance on the occasion were handed, without deduction of any kind, to the Committee for erecting a monument to the poet whose name the theatre now bears. A further sum of 6,000 lire has been subscribed by the general public.

STUTTGART.—The Bürger-Gesellschaft celebrated the King's birthday by a Festival Concert, under the direction of the Royal Chapelmaster, Herr J. Abert. The programme, which was rich and varied, contained Benedict's and De Beriot's duo "La Sonnambula," for piano and violin, played by Concertmaster Singer and Herr Winternitz; songs by Schubert, sung by Herr Albert Jäger; Frau Wahlmann declaiming two ballads—"Vom Haideknaben" and "Schön Hedwig—both with R. Schumann's dramatic piano accompaniments. The playing of our Kammer-Virtuose, Herr G. Krisger, was listened to with pleasure and satisfaction, and his performance on the harp of Oberthür's "Meditation," and "English Melodies of the Olden Time," &c., &c., was followed by unanimous applause. The concert concluded with Bach's Prelude, as arranged by Gounod, for harp, harmonium, and violin.

WAIFS.

At the sixth and last of the Bradford Subscription Concerts in St George's Hall, Mr Sullivan's oratorio, The Light of the World, was presented to a crowded and enthusiastic audience. Both the committee and Mr Sullivan may be fairly congratulated on a thorough success. The performance went off with the utmost spirit and éclat. Seldom has the hall been more crowded, and never do we remember the audience to have sat more patiently to the end. The principal vocalists were Mdme Sherrington, Mdme Patey, Messrs Vernon Rigby and Santley.—Bradford Observer.

The other day Mdlle Marie Dumas, who is well-known in London, gave an English concert in Paris. A sign of the times.

Mr John Forbes Robertson has just been appointed art editor of the Pictorial World. Mr Will Williams is the literary editor.

L'Art Musical says that Herr Strakosch will not manage the New York Opera next year. M. Cohn, it adds, will succeed him.

M. Consolo, violinist, former pupil of the Brussels Conservatory of Music here, has turned Mussulman and taken the name of Klamil. As such conversions are rare, it has created a sensation at Constantinople.

A Transatlantic writer thus criticises:—"The little miss who played the piano was the special blemish of the concert. She had no more idea of Chopin's Nocturne than a pullet can have of a family of fourteen chickens."

NEWS FROM PARIS.—"A rich London banker means to build a new opera-house in London, which will surpass in luxury that of Paris. When finished he will present the edifice to the English government." (!)

A band of praying-women gathered in front of what they supposed was a beer saloon the other day, and opened their batteries of song. Half an hour passed, and no effect was visible. They had wasted their efforts in front of a lawyer's office.

An American paper says that:—"Just about the worst, most horrible, flat, false, screamy, grunty, growly, bellowy, wheezy, jerky, whiny, inappropriate, ill-balanced, coarse, lop-sided, uncultivated, barbarous, and ear-distracting of all New York church-music is to be heard in its Ritualistic churches, and for the best of reasons."

A CHORAL SOCIETY has been recently formed at Parsonstown (King's County, Ireland), and the services of Mr Matthew Arnold are engaged as conductor. Weekly meetings are held in John's Hall. The works in immediate rehearsal are Mendelssohn's 42nd Psalm, Romberg's Lay of the Bell, Glees, &c. There are, we understand, over seventy members.

The Art Musical says:—Verdi's Requiem Messe, announced to be performed at the Opéra Comique in April, will attract an enormous crowd. The boxes are all taken up, and many amateurs have secured places for the whole of the performances. As the artists are bound to present themselves in London early in May, the Mass cannot be given more than a few times."

The budget of the opera at Brussels has recently assumed enormous proportions. Singers, orchestra, chorus, ballet, &c., cost fabulous sums, and matters threaten to grow worse. However great their contempt for money, the directors will in future be unable to make any outlay, except for novelties and works of great attraction; and, unless resigned to seeing the great stock pieces, with dingy scenery and costumes, the Corporation will be obliged to confer another grant, which, for the sake of real great works of art, cannot come too soon.—Guide Musical.

A great great nephew of Handel's, having presented a petition to the Emperor, begging that a street may be named after his relative, received a notification that a new quarter is going to be erected, in which all the streets will be named after celebrated musicians, on the principle already adopted for other artists in the Albrechts-Hof, and that the name of Handel will not be overlooked. The petitioner himself was born in 1803, at his father's house in the Wallstrasse, where he still resides. He is a constant and zealous attendant at the meetings of the Society for the History of Berlin.—Berlin Echo.

THE death of Mr J. C. Webster, late of the firm of Wilkie, Webster, and Allan, makes another break—writes the Melbourne Argus—in the chain connecting the present musical generation with the past. A period of nearly 40 years of service in the great London house of Broadwood and Sons brought him in contact with all the musical celebrities of the time, whether of the French, German, Italian, or English schools. A friend of Ries (the favourite pupil of Beethoven), he was also intimate in those circles wherein Smart and Stevenson were leaders. No man in this country was master of a greater fund of anecdote in connection with the musical world of his day than the late Mr Webster; and his conversation amongst his intimates on such subjects was always full of interest and entertainment. He died at his place at Moonee Ponds, on the 20th inst, aged 64 years.

ARTHUR SULLIVAN'S NEW SONG,
"THOU ART WEARY."
WORDS BY ADELAIDE PROCTOR.
MUSIC BY ARTHUR SULLIVAN.
SUNG BY
MISS ANTOINETTE STERLING
AT THE
MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

"The singer was Miss Antoinette Sterling, who, always heartily admired in those German ballads, for which she exhibits so marked a sympathy, introduced in a group four of Schumann's most graceful contributions to the Lieder repertory, and, later in the evening, a new song by Mr Arthur Sullivan, 'Thou art weary' (set to words by Adelaide Proctor)—one of the most charming recent emanations from the pen of our gifted compatriot."—The Times, Nov. 10.

"Miss Sterling was the vocalist, and sang, in addition to selections from Schumann, a new song by Arthur Sullivan, entitled, 'Thou art weary,' which is one of the most beautiful and thoughtful effusions of the composer's graceful music."—Daily Telegraph, Nov 12.

"Miss Antoinette Sterling was the vocalist. In the second part she introduced a new song by Mr Sullivan, an admirable setting for a contralto voice of some very touching lines by the late Miss Adelaide Proctor, addressed by a poor mother to her starving child, the burden being—

'Sleep, my darling, thou art weary;
God is good, but life is dreary.'

The song exactly suited Miss Sterling's voice and style, and it will assuredly become as great a favourite as 'Will he come,' to which it is a worthy pendant, and the words of which are also by Miss Proctor."—Standard, Nov. 12.

"Miss Antoinette Sterling repeated Mr Sullivan's new song, 'Thou art weary,' a second hearing of which has confirmed our good opinion of it."—Standard, Nov. 16.

"At the concert on Monday, Miss Sterling had introduced a series of charming Lieder by Schumann, and a new song by Mr Arthur Sullivan, 'Sleep, my darling, thou art weary,' an admirable setting of Miss Proctor's poem, 'Hush, I cannot bear to see thee,' which, like everything Miss Proctor wrote, was well adapted for, and, in fact, seemed to invite musical treatment. Her verses have inspired Mr Sullivan with a genuine melody, of which the refrain is particularly remarkable; and the song, both at Monday's and Saturday's concert, pleased so much that Miss Sterling was called upon to repeat it."—Pall Mall Gazette, Nov. 17.

"Miss Sterling sang discreetly and sympathetically four of Schumann's 'Dichterliebe' (Nos. 1, 2, 7, and 8); but came off still better in a new song by Mr A. Sullivan, who has set words by Adelaide Proctor, 'Thou art weary,' the dying consolation of a starved mother to her child, the refrain of which is—

'Sleep, my darling, thou art weary;
God is good, but life is dreary.'

It is a painful theme; but the composer has treated it with such pathos that the air tells powerfully."—Athenæum, Nov. 14.

"The vocalist was Miss Sterling, who sang four songs by Schumann (Nos. 1, 2, 7, and 8 of the 'Dichterliebe'), and a new song, entitled 'Thou art weary,' written by Miss Adelaide Proctor. The words are good, and have been fitted to charming and expressive music by Mr Arthur Sullivan, who has added a pianoforte accompaniment worthy his high reputation, and worth listening to for its own sake."—Observer, Nov. 15.

Published in the keys of D minor and F minor, Price 4s.

ARTHUR SULLIVAN'S NEW SONG,
"TENDER AND TRUE,"
SUNG BY
MISS EDITH WYNNE
AT THE
MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS, ST JAMES'S HALL.

"The vocalist was Miss Edith Wynne, who sang a new song, 'Tender and True,' by Arthur Sullivan, the beauty of which, aided by a most tasteful rendering, elicited an encore."—Daily Telegraph, January 13.

"Mr Sullivan's graceful song—a novelty—was rendered by Miss Edith Wynne with much refined expression; and the applause which followed necessitated its entire repetition."—Daily News, January 13.

"A very expressive new song, by Mr A. Sullivan, 'Tender and True,' was sung with such effect by Miss Edith Wynne that it had to be repeated."—Illustrated London News, January 16.

"Miss Edith Wynne, who gave, in her own genuine and expressive manner, a graceful new song, 'Tender and True,' by Mr Arthur Sullivan, which was encored and repeated."—Graphic, January 16.

Published in the keys of E flat and F, Price 4s.

CONCORDIA:

A Journal of Music and the Sister Arts.

TO BE PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY, PRICE 4D.

On May 1*st* will be issued the first number of Concordia, a Journal chiefly devoted to the interests of Music.

While holding definite opinions, Concordia will strive to make itself the organ of an enlightened eclecticism. Regarding every question without prejudice, and solely in the interest of Art, it will encourage in its contributors and correspondents that free expression of ideas which ultimately establishes truth. Above all, it will be actuated by a desire to recognise and promote whatever is good in the new developments which are inseparable from the progressive nature of Music.

A leading feature of Concordia will be the number and importance of its original Articles and Essays. Among the gentlemen who have already signified their willingness to contribute are:—

J. BARNBY.	H. SUTHERLAND EDWARDS.	G. A. MACFARREN, Prof. Mus., Cantab.	C. K. SALAMAN.
JOSEPH BENNETT.	Rev. H. R. HAWEIS, M.A.	WALTER MACFARREN.	HENRY SMART.
W. CHAPPELL, F.S.A.	HENRY HOWE.	PROFESSOR H. S. OAKELEY.	Dr STAINER, M.A.
W. H. CUMMINGS.	JOHN HULLAH.	EBENEZER PROUT, B.A.	T. L. STILLIE.
E. DANNREUTHER.	H. C. LUNN.		Dr W. H. STONE, M.A.

From week to week notices of subjects connected with the sister Arts of Poetry and Painting, the Drama, &c., will be contributed to Concordia by able writers.

As a medium of news, Concordia will be singularly complete.

Special attention will be paid to that criticism of Art and its exponents which is the greatest responsibility as it is the greatest privilege, of such a Journal. On all matters involving criticism, Concordia will speak with a single desire that the truth may be known.

The department of Reviews will receive the care demanded by its importance, and prominence will be given, in this department, to the leading works published abroad.

Among other valuable features of Concordia will be, subject to the co-operation of the various publishers, a weekly list of new Music, and of Services, Anthems, &c., to be sung in the Cathedrals and chief Parish Churches on the Sunday following each issue.

It is believed that, in Concordia, the art-loving public will have a thoroughly readable Journal—one, that is to say, which interests the Amateur not less than the connoisseur. No pains will be spared in order to secure this desirable result.

ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION, INCLUDING POSTAGE, 19s. 6d.

A scale of charges for Advertisements in "Concordia" may be had on application to the Publishers.

BAYREUTH.*

This introduction ought of itself to extort from every impartial person an appreciative: "Well roared, lion!" and enable him to form an adequate idea of the powerful pencil wielded by the critic who, though he has pulled out all his stops, seems not to be in the slightest degree exhausted, but, with undiminished strength, goes on swinging the censer as follows:

"So powerful a spell as that exercised at the present day by Wagner over the masses belongs to no other existing artist; a similar demoniacal influence can have appertained only to Liszt in the most brilliant days of his virtuosity."

This parallel, interesting, without a doubt, to Liszt exaltados and Wagner enthusiasts, is followed by the information that to-day—the 1st March, 1875—"the interest and excitement of the public are, as may well be imagined, increased ten-fold, since they are aroused not only by the individuality of the celebrated composer, but by new works of his with grand intentions"—are these intentions realized, we may ask—"works which he will produce, and of which, with the exception of some of his most intimate confidants, no mortal knows a single note."

When, in the notice, at which we at length arrive, of the concert itself, we find the "Kaisermarch," which is played by way of introduction, designated in one and the same breath a "thorough festive and, intellectually considered, grandly conceived, but, musically, not very important, occasional piece," we are unable quite to understand how a composition can be simultaneously "intellectually considered, grandly conceived," but, "musically, not very important." Can the writer allude to the important chasm which, in Wagner's case, is not seldom perceptible between intention and realization, between the will and the deed?

The description of the manner in which the public received the three Fragments, performed after the "Kaisermarch," from the Götterdämmerung, the fourth and last part of the grand Stage-Festival-Play, Der Ring der Nibelungen, is literally dripping with transcendentalism, and reminds us involuntarily of the battle-bulletins issued by the first Napoleon, and which, from their imposing and exceedingly mouth-filling lapidary style, have acquired a somewhat unenviably notoriety. "The reception of the pieces on the part of the public"—so runs the account word for word—"kept rising from one Fragment to another, until it reached enthusiasm, just as though Wagner's desk was, even at first, hung with laurel wreaths, after the 'Kaisermarch,' and each piece from the Götterdämmerung fresh specimens of these blooming 'offerings of immortality' keep cropping up, there having probably been on the whole above twenty of them." The culminating point of the enthusiasm, which, it must be confessed, the easily excitable Viennese public took down in by no means homœopathic doses, was the fact of Wagner's being called on at least twelve times, after which he felt a desire to say something, and—of course, "in a voice half choked with emotion"—heartily thanked the glorious public of Vienna, who had assisted him so considerably towards realizing the task of his life.† He added that he had now the more ground for hoping that his work would be carried out, because his audience had greeted, with such exceedingly lively and sympathetic interest, the Fragments, "which are so difficult of performance when isolated, so difficult to be understood, and so dependent upon scenic accessories."

It is here well to remark, and to bear in mind, firstly: that (characteristically for the consistency of his principles) Wagner, formerly the sworn enemy of all performances at concerts of his opera-dramas, when they must necessarily be presented in a fragmentary shape, has now, yielding to the most sensitive of all nerves—the nervus rerum gerendarum—come to adopt such performances; and, furthermore, that it is the "poet-composer" himself, who describes these fragments as "difficult to understand," and of such a nature that scenic accessories are indispensably necessary to them. The critic in question thinks that, in speaking of them thus, Wagner has characterised them in the best possible manner, and he extends his confession by a remark which appears too important as regards the characterization and right appreciation of the whole (Wagnerian) tendency to be withheld from the reader. The critic says then: "These pieces may have been for many a one among the audience, riddles not to be solved, if he did not know the connection between the different parts of the Trilogy, and did not keep in mind the fact that, in his most recent music Wagner never writes a single bar for its own sake, but writes everything to mean, explain, or illustrate something." Thus, then, Wagner's most recent music of itself means nothing, it is of itself meaningless, and receives all its meaning exclusively from the action which it serves to explain—or, in other words—illustrate.* With laudable frankness, the critic now remarks that: "For any one who is unprepared beforehand,† comprehension" (of the Fragments in question) "is the more difficult, because Wagner composed his Nibelungen as one great whole, and that hence the motives of one opera are transferred to another (for instance, from Rheingold to the Walküre), and with the motives invariably certain ideas (as, for instance, the recollection of Siegfried, the hero and lover; of Brunhilde; of the Daughters of the Rhine; of Alberich's curse; of Wotan's farewell; of the God, Loge, as the musical impersonification of fire, etc). These ideas the public immediately recollects when the corresponding musical thoughts crop up,‡ and they thus serve as guides in the otherwise obscure labyrinths of the Nibelungen scores." "Any one now"—the oracular notice goes on to say—"who has studied these scores, or even only the respective pianoforte arrangements, and consequently knows the import of the motives selected; and who, furthermore, has attentively followed the three rehearsals preceding the performance, besides bringing with him no prejudice against Wagnerian music, diverging, as it does from the classical track and striking out a previously untroden path"§—all being conditions the critic happens to combine in his own case—"must feel that in the Fragments from the Götterdämmerung, the peculiar dramatic power of expression belonging to the Wagnerian orchestra has reached its culminating point."‖ At the same time, however, the critic finds that "over certain portions of the pieces performed there is diffused a melodic charm, which brings them nearer the absolute musician, and is not often met with in Wagner." According to the view which the critic here very clearly enunciates, only those persons who, by a sufficient study of the scores or the pianoforte arrangements, have learnt how the land lies, and who have been able to attend the rehearsals preparatory to the performance, are in a position to arrive at a satisfactory comprehension of the Fragments. It is however, only musicians—and not all musicians in an equal degree—who understand scores and pianoforte arrangements; but not even musicians have always time and opportunity—besides not always being equally susceptible and well-disposed—for attending repeated rehearsals. Of course, on the principles laid down above, the general public would be shut out from all possibility of understanding these Fragments. Music, however, like every other art, exists not only for the artist and the connoisseur, but for every one; for which reason, any pretext of exclusiveness will

* From the Neue Berliner Musikzeitung.

† The net profit from the concert was devoted to the augmentation of the Bayreuth Festival-Play Fund.

* We are here informed, with a plainness leaving nothing to be desired, what is the essential difference between Richard Wagner and dramatic composers who have preceded him, and whose music even "of itself," when severed from the plot of the drama which it accompanies, had and still retains significancy.

† As if the preponderating portion of every public did not consist of persons unprepared beforehand!

‡ But suppose anyone should not recollect—as may very well be the case, should he happen to belong to the unhappy individuals who are "unprepared beforehand"—suppose he first requires to be reminded by some one else that this motive ought to remind him of Siegfried; that, of Brunhilde, etc.—What then! Then, in all probability, he would find himself in the exact position of the Scholar in Faust; he would be as confused with regard to all he was hearing and had heard, as though a mill-wheel were going round inside his head.

§ Should not this properly run thus: Everyone who considers Richard Wagner the only god of music, and alone possessing power to render us blessed, while he looks upon all his predecessors in the same domain as mere wretched bunglers in art, and their works as immature essays, fit for nothing save the lumber-room.

‖ We must here involuntarily ask ourselves: Who, then, really sings, moves, and acts in Wagner's opera-dramas; is it the orchestra, or is it not rather, wholly and solely, the singer?

always indicate confusion as well as weakness, and every artist who shuts out the general public from the comprehension and enjoyment of his work must expect the said public to care nothing for him. That the critic should expressly refer to the melodic charm, which—in his opinion—is diffused over certain portions of the pieces performed, constitutes a confession, not to be undervalued, of the importance justly attributed by "absolute musicians" to melody, as the real soul of music,* just as the remark that melodic charm does not too frequently occur in Wagner, gives evidence of laudable discernment and ingenuousness.

EMMA ALBANI.

On Tuesday night the return of Mdlle Albani was welcomed by an audience as appreciative as it was numerous. The young Canadian songstress is an established favourite both at Covent Garden and elsewhere. This is not surprising, because she regards her profession from a serious point of view, and leaves nothing untried that may help in bringing her nearer to the goal. Her natural advantages, it is true, are exceptional. But, not satisfied with these, she has honestly laboured, and, with the aid of persevering study, become a genuine mistress of her art—thus verifying the opinion of amateurs who, when she first appeared among us, prophesied highly of her future. Each succeeding year has brought with it such marked improvement as could hardly escape the notice even of connoisseurs not quick in detecting early promise, and not over-sanguine in recognizing its fulfilment. The opera chosen for the present occasion was Bellini's perennial Sonnambula. It was in the character of Amina (April 2, 1872) that Mdlle Albani appealed for the first time to the sympathies of an English audience, and with what result is not forgotten. Her performance then exhibited gifts and qualities quite out of the ordinary way. Season after season, however, it has been advancing gradually towards the absolute excellence which it may be said in all fairness to have attained, both in the dramatic embodiment and its vocal illustration. In fact, the progress made by Mdlle Albani as an actress is hardly less remarkable than the progress she has made as a singer. Her portrayal of the innocent village maiden, who has only her heart to offer for dowry, is as interesting in its details as it is natural and charming in its general bearing. Her execution of the music, here simple and melodious, there florid and ornate, here so plaintive, there so joyous, is in each particular almost all that could be wished, leaving scarcely a point open to criticism. The cordial welcome that greeted her on Tuesday evening exercised, no doubt, a beneficial influence, and urged Mdlle Albani to strive her utmost to show that she was not undeserving of it. That she succeeded was proved by the strong impression she created, and the continued applause bestowed upon every one of her more striking efforts. The opening recitative, "Care compagne," and its pendent cavatina, "Come per me sereno," in which Amina dwells with subdued rapture on her approaching happiness, were heard with unanimous satisfaction; while the brilliant sequel, "Sovra il sen," profusely ornamented in accordance with traditional custom, was followed by the loudest demonstrations, renewed again and again after the expressive parting duet between Amina and Elvino at the end of the first act. The scene of the bed-room, which constitutes the whole of the second, was equally happy. Here the poignant accents and despairing gestures with which the wronged Amina tries vainly to persuade her lover of her innocence afforded Mdlle Albani opportunities for the exhibition of intense feeling, which she turned to the best account. The whole scene was admirable, and the hearty recognition of the effect it had produced upon the house required neither bouquets nor calls before the curtain to add to its significance. The last scene of all—the scene of the mill, the somnambulism, the faded flowers, the restoration of the ring, and the awakening once again to happiness—was of a piece with what had gone before. We need not go into details about a situation every incident of which is familiar. Enough that in the pathetic apostrophe to the flowers, "Ah! non credea mirarti," Mdlle Albani was enabled to exhibit not only deep feeling, but a command of mezza voce singing that increases, and acquires greater charm, with her years; while in the joyous sequel, "Ah non giunge," she, not for the first time, proved herself an equally accomplished mistress of the bravura style. The curtain fell amid loud and prolonged applause, accompanied with further bouquets and recalls. In short, a more complete success could not have been desired. Signor Piazza, as times and tenors go, a very acceptable Elvino, was particularly good in the duets with Amina, both in the first and second acts. Signor Bagagiolo, as the Count, showed excellent taste in the bedroom scene, and sang "Vi ravviso" so thoroughly to the liking of the audience that he was compelled to repeat it. The Lisa was Mdlle Cottini; the Teresa, Madame Anese. Signor Vianesi conducted.

MADAME CHRISTINE NILSSON IN BRUSSELS.

(From "L'Etoile Belge.")

THEATRES.—Les adieux de Mme Christine Nilsson ont valu hier soir à cette célèbre artiste l'ovation la plus enthousiaste qui, de mémoire d'abonné, ait eu lieu au théâtre royal de la Monnaie. Rappelée trois fois après le quatrième acte des Huguenots, Mme Nilsson a été acclamée par le public, sous une véritable pluie de fleurs. Cinq minutes durant, ce fut, à la lettre, une avalanche de bouquets lancés de tous les coins de la salle. La scène en était littéralement jonchée; on eût dit que l'on avait pillé toutes les serres de Bruxelles. Le quatrième acte de Hamlet, qui clôturait le spectacle et les représentations de la diva, qui a été suivi de nouvelles et chaleureuses ovations accompagnées encore et toujours de fleurs et de bouquets les plus splendides.

TO THE MEMORY OF ELIZA F. MORRIS.

Alas! 'tis true that she is dead,
Who sweetly sang the "Angels' Song;"
So still and lifeless is that head,
Which rolled sweet harmony along.

Those beaming, intellectual eyes
Will heighten beauty here no more;
But, in the realms above the skies,
They'll shine far brighter than before.

Those hands, which swept the glowing lyre,
Are now, too, motionless and still;
That soul, which flashed celestial fire,
Has left us at its Maker's will.

Those ears, so exquisitely fine,
Caught up the music of the skies,
Submissive to the Power Divine,
Are closed to earthly sounds and ties.

That voice, which sang in accents clear,
Harmonious strains that ne'er will die,
Has now attained a higher sphere,
A glorious one above the sky.

Enrolled in Heaven's eternal choir,
She sings our great Redeemer's praise;
Where saints to loftier heights aspire,
And highest hallelujahs raise.

Yes, she, whose gentle spirit stirred
Our eyes to tears, while here below,
Is now where sighs are never heard,
And tributary tears ne'er flow.

Eternal are her pleasures now:
How different the joys of earth!
A crown of glory decks her brow,
The product of the second birth.

Her lyric gems can never die:
No, they'll be profitably read,
While ages yet unborn pass by,
And silently entomb their dead.

In honour of th' illustrious dead,
I pen this tributary lay;
And, long as reason rules this head,
The heart shall ready homage pay.

MUSICAL ASSOCIATION.

Beethoven especially we often hear of as a great "tone poet." I should say that if this terminology is to be accepted at all, it should be graduated or made more precise so as to express the rank of the poet to whom it is applied. If Beethoven be a tone poet, some of our contemporaries should be authorised to call J. S. Bach an augmented tone poet, and, e converso, Rossini a "semitone poet." What designation should be applied to the vast crowd of less successful aspirants to musical fame I know not. Perhaps they might be put off with some of those minute intervals, the excess or insufficiency of which disturbs the minds of those who still generously devote themselves to the search after that philosopher's stone of our art—perfect intonation. I pass on now to the consideration of expression, under which term we may class words and signs indicative of pace, intensity, and style. A growing disposition has been observable of late among the different musical people of Europe to use their own language as vehicles for these indications. I think this is to be regretted: (1) as inconvenient to foreigners among whom their music is likely to go. It seems hard on an English, French, Italian, Hungarian, or Bohemian musician that to understand a piece of music by any eminent modern German master he must not only be a musician but a linguist; that he should not merely be able to appreciate the musical sound of the notes in the score before him, but have also a vocabulary—practically unlimited—of German words. He opens, say, Schumann's overture to Genoveva. He sees, by the position of the stave headed by the C clef, and designated "Bratsche," what is the meaning of that word; he need not have much doubt about the stave similarly headed and holding three parts against which is written "Posaunen;" by the shapes of the passages intended for them he may construct ventilhorn in es, waldhorn, and pauken, and by the help of the metronome mark he may come at the meaning of langsam. But a little further on he encounters leidenschaftlich bewegt, which is harder upon him; and, a little further still, sehr frisch, which is really too bad. This example has lately found imitators among the Scandinavians, who expressed their musical intention in words which a German of philological tastes and pursuits could doubtless make out, but which to the average German must be as unintelligible as to the average Englishman. Strange to say, the French, who take it for granted that everybody understands their language, or ought to—have not sinned in this way so much as the Germans. It is true that the scores of their operas are covered with phrases like "avec chaleur," "très simplement," "à demi-voix," "avec ironie;" but these may be regarded as "stage directions," addressed to, and inevitably intelligible to, those who are to play the parts, as well as sing the music to which they refer. Otherwise French composers limit themselves in their scores to a few native words such as détaché, doucement, and the like. As for ourselves our modern musical publications would indicate, what certainly is the reverse of true, that we are the greatest linguists on earth. It is needless to present examples of what everybody is familiar with; we have all seen, and see daily, title pages, for instance, in which two, three, and even four languages are employed. (2) Irrespective of its practical inconvenience, which I do not wish to overrate, this practice takes from music its noblest characteristic—its catholicity. We musicians are able to discourse in a language touching to the hearts, if not always clear to the intelligences, of every people on the face of the globe; and we are furnished with an alphabet in which to write this language, which is not the invention of a single mind but of a thousand minds; a thing which has marched on to its present perfection pari passu beside music itself; an alphabet so clear—to him who knows how to read it—that a musical composition, no matter of what intricacy, composed, let us say, at Moscow, can, without any serious violation of the intentions of its author, and without his personal assistance, be performed within a few days, weeks, or months, in London, Paris, New York, or Melbourne, wherever there are artists to interpret it. Let us cherish this precious possession, and do what we can to prevent its acquiring a sectarian, provincial, or even national character, through the introduction of any peculiarities whatever. The directions of which I have spoken were, up to a comparatively recent time, made all the world over in one language—Italian. And even to this hour the most Teutonic of musical composers are still obliged to resort to that language. In the score of which I have just spoken, Schumann's Genoveva there are as many Italian words or abbreviations of Italian words as there are measures—very often more. The words "dolce," "sempre," "basso," "soli," "divisi," and the like are of frequent occurrence; and as for the contractions of "piano," "forte," "crescendo," "diminuendo," "sforzato," and the like, they may be counted by hundreds. Granted that Italy has not been observant of Andrew Marvel's caution—

> "The same arts that did attain
> A power must it maintain."

Granted that she has not held her own against such competitors as Germany during the last hundred years has brought into the field, are we to loose all veneration for the people whom the slightest aquaintance with musical history will show to have been the musical teachers of all the world? Are we to kick down the ladder by which we have risen to our present superiority, to turn a cold shoulder on old friends because we have become better off, and, it may be, wiser than he? Not, however, to throw more sentiment round this matter than it will bear, it does seem unwise to subject ourselves to the inconveniences of which I have spoken, when they can be avoided by the simple process of using only one vocabulary, and that not a new or unaccustomed one, but one with which every musical people is at least partially familiar.

An interesting discussion took place at the conclusion of the paper, in which Mr Bannister, Mr Stephens, Dr Stainer, and Mr Ellis took part.

SIGNOR SALVINI AND MR H. IRVING.

(To the Editor of the "Times.")

SIR,—I have reason to believe that a false impression exists concerning my conduct in regard to Signor Salvini's late morning performance, and, in consequence, I venture to trouble you with this letter.

Immediately after the first appearance of Signor Salvini I called on Messrs. Lacon and Ollier, and requested them to secure me a box for the first morning representation Signor Salvini might give. This was some days before any morning performance had been to my knowledge suggested.

At this time I was invited to meet Signor Salvini by a friend, who conveyed to me gracious expressions Signor Salvini had used concerning my representation of Hamlet. I was, unfortunately, prevented from accepting this invitation, and, hearing from our friend that Signor Salvini might be gratified at receiving direct expression of my great desire to see him act, I subsequently wrote and received from him a most courteous reply; and I am sure Signor Salvini (whom, after all, it alone concerns) would be the last to impute any paltry motive to the absence of my name to the round-robin circular.—I am, Sir, obediently yours,

Garrick Club, April 21. HENRY IRVING.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

Mdlle Zaré Thalberg's second appearance more than confirmed the highly flattering opinions created by her début. She again appeared as Zerlina, and was received with the same unanimous favour. We find no reason to modify in any way our first impressions of this very young lady, in whom the director of the Royal Italian Opera has, we feel convinced, discovered a real treasure. A wiser selection for her début than the character of the simple rustic maiden of Da Ponte and Mozart could not have been hit upon. That which Mdlle Thalberg is able to do in another line remains to be seen; but if credence may be given to all that was said and written about her during her sojourn in Paris last year, we are justified in believing that she has a very different kind of music at easy command. What will be the next task allotted to her at Covent Garden is at present a matter of conjecture. Meanwhile, to have charmed every hearer in such incomparable melodies as those that suggested themselves so readily to the composer of Don Giovanni is something of which any young aspirant might feel reasonably proud; and her having done this shows Mdlle Thalberg to be a worthy daughter of the man who proved that an instrument could be made to sing just like the human voice.

Although Mr Gye has hitherto offered to the public nothing absolutely new, he, in less than three weeks, produced eleven operas—the majority of them "grand" in the strictest acceptation of the term. To say nothing about Guillaume Tell, which "inaugurated" the season, we have had Robert le Diable, the Africaine, and the Huguenots of Meyerbeer, besides the Favorita of Donizetti. All these elaborate works were more or less efficiently presented. The only opera which, up to the actual time, has been brought forward more than once is Don Giovanni—and that for a reason easily understood. The re-engagement of Signor Naudin—one of the most useful and versatile tenors in Europe—has been of essential service in the Africaine and the Huguenots. That he was selected by Meyerbeer himself for the original representative of Vasco di Gama, our musical readers are aware; and that just now there are very few more intimately acquainted with the dramatic traditions or more able to meet the vocal requirements of such a part as that of Raoul de Nangis is equally well known. Madame Marie Vilda, though by no means an ideal Alice, or an ideal Valentine, possesses so fine a voice, and such considerable dramatic power, that in the absence of a younger singer, with resources physical and mental in proportion, she can hardly be regarded as unacceptable—which, indeed, the applause bestowed upon her efforts sufficed to show. Mdlle Scalchi, now recognized as one of the best contraltos on the Italian stage, has again proved her ability to undertake the character of Leonora, in the Favorita, originally written for Rosina Stoltz, the once famous mezzo-soprano of the Paris Grand Opera. The lighter operas in the repertory have also proved attractive, the Elisir d'Amore and the Figlia del Reggimento among them. In the first, Mdlle Smeroschi was as lively an Adina as before, acting with vivacity and executing the music with the same fluency. In the last, Mdlle Marimon, as Maria, exhibited all the brilliant qualities that have won her general admiration. As a vocalist of the school most congenial to the taste of those among whom she has passed her artistic career, Mdlle Marimon is, perhaps, without a rival. The Vivandière of Donizetti is one of her most spirited assumptions. She looks and acts the character to perfection, and sings the music precisely as it ought to be sung. That she can impart expression to a plaintive strain as well as brilliancy to one that demands mere executive fluency is amply proved by her delivery of "Convien partir," the pathetic "adieu" of Maria to the soldiers with whom she has so long been intimately associated. On Saturday night she was received with the utmost cordiality, encored in the apostrophe to the Regiment, "Ciascun lo dice" (Act I.), in the "Rataplan," with the Marchioness and Sulpizio (Act II.), and applauded with enthusiasm after her marvellously facile delivery of a "valse," composed by M. Maton, which it is her custom to introduce at the end of the opera. Signor Piazza, an excellent light tenor as times go, showed the same efficiency in the part of Tonio as he had already shown in that of Nemorino (L'Elisir d'Amore), with Mdlle Smeroschi. The sparkling music of Donizetti was heard with the accustomed pleasure. Signor Vianesi presided in the orchestra.

On Monday, Mdlle Thalberg made her third appearance, with increased success—the opera again being Don Giovanni. The rentrée of that general favourite, Mdlle Albani, came off on Tuesday, the part of her choice being, once more, Amina. On Thursday, Lucia was given, with Albani as the heroine, and the new tenor, Signor De Sanctis, as the hero. Lucrezia Borgia, with Mdme Vilda, was announced for last night; and for this evening we are promised the always welcome Fra Diavolo.

MUSIC IN MANCHESTER.

(From our Correspondent.)

M. Rivière's season of Promenade Concerts terminated on Saturday last; and I regret to say that prosperity did not favour it. The orchestra was excellent, the programmes constantly and pleasantly varied, and the auditorum arrangement admirably adapted to the comfort and convenience of the audience. It was a mistake, however, to fix the price of admission to the promenade at more than a shilling, and the adoption of this price when the season was half over was too late to secure popularity; an initial success in concerts of this character certainly being specially valuable from a commercial point of view. The concerts would perhaps have been more attractive had the directors been able to secure one eminent singer for every concert; as it was, the several singers who appeared on the same evening were often, though artists of merit, comparatively unknown.

The last orchestral concert of the "Gentlemen's Concerts" was given on Monday evening. I enclose the programme :—

PART I.—Symphony in B flat—Schubert; Recit. ed Aria, "Ah! se tu dormi" (Romeo e Giulietta) (Miss Purdy)—Vaccaj; Recit. ed Aria, "Hai gai vinta" (Le Nozze di Figaro) (Mr Santley)—Mozart; Recit. and Air, "I dreamt I was in heaven" (Naaman) (Mdme Patey)—Costa; Solo Pianoforte, Concerto in A minor (Mr Walter Bache)—Schumann. PART II.—Overture, (Euryanthe)—Weber; Couplets, "Se l'Arlesi son regine" (Mirella) (Mr Santley)—Gounod; Air, "L'Alleluia de Sinai" (transcript per M. Moret) (Miss Purdy)—Haydn; Air, "Nel lasciarti" (Mdme Patey)—Cimarosa; Solo Pianoforte, Rhapsodie Hongroise in A, No. 13 (Mr Walter Bache)—Liszt; Song, "Fair is my love" (Mr Santley)—Hatton; Song, "By the sad sea waves" (Mdme Patey)—Benedict; Overture (Domino Noir)—Auber.

Mr Walter Bache, who made his first appearance in Manchester, was very cordially received, and his playing was greatly admired.

Mdme Patey's voice was never in more superb condition, and, if she sang in Paris with anything like the finish and vocal power displayed here on Monday, the compliments and comparisons of the critics were certainly not extravagant. Miss Purdy had previously sung here, and then, as now, her good taste and the absence of affectation in her singing were generally appreciated. Mr Santley was also in splendid voice, and never sang with greater success. We, in Manchester, hear with mingled feelings of this great artist's engagement with Carl Rosa. Mr Santley's absence from the stage has involved the disappearance of some of the finest lyric impersonations of modern times, and every lover of the lyric drama will welcome his determination to assist the movement in favour of a national opera. But the concerts must suffer, especially the oratorios, if Mr Santley can only be heard on the stage.

The orchestral selections at Monday's concert were all admirably played, and Mr Halle was, as usual, the conductor.

Mr Sims Reeves, who is now in Manchester, will sing at a ballad concert, in the Free Trade Hall, to-morrow (Thursday) night.

HER MAJESTY'S OPERA.

The performance of Rigoletto on Saturday night was interesting, if only on account of a new singer of more than common ability being introduced to us, in the character of Gilda. To give a fair portrayal of this, perhaps the most charming of Verdi's heroines, natural gifts as well as artistic acquirement are indispensable. Mdlle Elena Varesi possesses both. Daughter of Varesi, for whom the part of the Court Jester was originally intended, and of Boccabadati, one of the most distinguished vocalists of her day, the débutante comes from a promising source. She is very young—in her twenty-first year, we understand—but already exhibits perfect ease on the boards, and is, in the truest sense, an actress, graceful in appearance, natural in her gestures, and able to express emotion in its varied phases, without a hint of exaggeration. What chiefly recommends Mdlle Varesi as a singer is the fact of her being mistress of the pure Italian style, which, the advantages she must have derived from early training borne in mind, is not surprising, even at her age. Her voice, a genuine soprano, some of its accents occasionally recalling those of the much-regretted Angiolina Bosio, appears to us somewhat deficient in power. Nevertheless, it is sweet and penetrating throughout its range. At the beginning of her first scene, Mdlle Varesi was, seemingly, too overcome with nervousness to exercise the complete control necessary to adequate vocal and dramatic expression. But, warmed up by the sympathetic encouragement of the audience, she gradually recovered her self-possession, and, in the duet between Gilda and her unknown lover, ending with the impassioned "Addio, addio," which immediately follows the interview with Rigoletto, this was favourably shown. The tuneful soliloquy, "Caro nome," was given in a manner so entirely to the satisfaction of the house, that a repetition was called for, to which Sir Michael Costa accorded ready assent. From this point similar marks of approval were unsparingly lavished upon the new comer—at the end of the duet which constitutes the finale to Act II., when Rigoletto has discovered his daughter in the palace of the Duke, and again at the last fall of the curtain. Enough has been said to describe the impression created by Mdlle Varesi on a more than usually impressionable house. Her success was indisputable; but that she has not yet displayed her full resources is, we think, equally beyond question. Her career will be watched with interest. The opera was generally well given. Signor Gilandi, as the Duke, and Signor Galassi, as the Jester, though both a little over-demonstrative, possess powerful voices, and succeeded in winning the hearty applause of the audience; while the Maddalena of Mdme Trebelli, it may be safely added, is the best on record, not excepting that of the late Nantier Didiée, among the earliest representatives of the character. That the orchestral accompaniments were all that could be wished, and that "La donna é mobile" (Signor Gilandi), as well as the famous quartet in the last act, received the customary encores, will be taken for granted. Sir Michael Costa never took more pains to ensure a good performance, or to support a young débutante.

The first representation of Marta brought back Mdlle Louise Singelli, who, in several characters, that of Lady Enrichetta among the number, created so agreeable an impression last season. Mdlle Singelli's sprightly and finished acting, to say nothing of her personal appearance, would always ensure for her a hearty welcome. To describe her portrayal of Flotow's heroine anew is unnecessary; enough that it has lost none of those attractions which made it acceptable from the first. She could hardly have rendered the familiar romance, "Qui sola, vergin rosa" (the "Last Rose of Summer"), in a manner more pleasing and unaffected, or have better deserved the encore it obtained. The Lionello was Signor Brignoli, who, though he has deserted us so long for foreign parts, and especially for the United States of America, was not the less cordially received. This artist's voice may not be what it used to be—and what voice can for ever retain its prime? But, on the other hand, his method of delivery and his style of phrasing are, as they have always been, legitimate, which enables him to give expression without undue force—a gift not so common now as it was wont to be. This was especially shown in the amorous soliloquy, "M'appari tutt' amor," which, as might have been expected, he had to sing twice. Herr Behrens was a Plumketto of the right calibre; Madame Trebelli a Nancy hardly now to be matched; and Signor Zoboli a by no means inefficient Lord Tristano;—after which, unless it be to record that Mdlle Rosa Viale was much and deservedly applauded in the ballet at the Statute Fair, what more can possibly be written about Marta?

That Lucrezia Borgia would be performed early in the season, with Mdlle Tietjens, the greatest existing representative of the tragic heroine of Victor Hugo and Donizetti, at command, was only to be expected. Signor Campanini, too, as Gennaro, the character in which he first became known to an English audience, to say nothing of Madame Trebelli, the Maffeo Orsini upon whose shoulders the mantle of Alboni, who first gave importance to a part till her time regarded as almost insignificant, has fallen, were in the cast. All three were received according to their merits, and obtained the accustomed applause. How Mdlle Tietjens sings "Com' è bello"; how Signor Campanini sings "Di pescatore ignobile," and how Madame Trebelli sings "Il segreto per esser felice," need not be said. The second and third of these, as well as the famous trio for Alphonso (Herr Behrens), Lucrezia, and Gennaro, "Guai se ti Sfugge un moto," were, as usual, encored. Here, too, we have an opera so well known and so often repeated, year after year, that to invent a new sentence about it, or about its general performance, always so effective at our London Opera-houses, would be difficult. That Lucrezia Borgia retains its popularity is not to be denied, even by those who would desire to see it, together with other works of the kind that might be named, supplanted—for a period at least—by something new, and who look with unconcealed anxiety for the promised Lohengrin.

Fidelio was repeated on Monday night; Rigoletto was given for the second time on Tuesday; the opera on Thursday was Le Nozze di Figaro, for the début of a new singer, Mdlle Pernini; and for to-night we are promised Il Barbiere, and the first appearance in this country of the new operatic "star," Mdlle Anna de Belocca.

MUSIC IN NEW ZEALAND.

(From our Correspondent.)

Mr G. B. Allen's English Opera company has been drawing good houses. It says much for a young country that it can maintain a large and expensive opera troupe for a year; but then New Zealand citizens are nearly all English, not long from home. Many of the recent arrivals express astonishment to find such performances taking place here, and agree with the criticisms in the Evening Star, that they bear comparison with those at home. Miss Alice May's progress through the country has been quite triumphal. All agree that none was ever seen like her before in New Zealand, and that when she returns to England she must take one of the highest positions among English prime donne. Her Marguerite and her Elenora are fine specimens of acting, while her sympathetic voice, which has that wonderful quality of "tears" in it, touches the heart at once. Her Martha, too, is excellent, although she lacks the flexibility of voice necessary to render perfectly the florid music belonging to M. Flotow's heroine, but she makes ample amends in the "Last Rose of Summer," which, probably, she sings as well as any artist living. The company leave on the 21st for Invercargill, en route for Melbourne. Miss May has received a large number of valuable presents on this her second visit to Dunedin. Certainly she will have good reason to remember her New Zealand tour, and must always look back with pleasure to the many kind friends and ardent admirers she has left there. Last night her farewell benefit took place, and the house was crowded in every part.

Miss Christian is in Auckland, where she failed commercially, like everyone else. The company that Madame Goddard left behind joined Miss Christian, and gave a week's concerts to empty benches. She returns shortly to Melbourne, where, fortunately, there are less "performing" amateurs and much more taste in matters musical.

Dunedin, Feb. 18.

Florence.—There has been found, among the papers of the late Carlo Romani, an opera, entitled, Gianni di Nisida. Owing to the brilliant success of Selvaggia at the Fenice, it is said that the firm of F. Lucca has commissioned Sig. Schira to write a new work.—The rehearsals of Crescimanno's Filippo have commenced at the Teatro della Pergola.

The Musical World,

LONDON, SATURDAY, APRIL 24, 1875.

WE read in the Guide Musical, of Brussels, an article, under the heading of An Instrumental Gem, well worth the pains of translating, as likely to interest so many of our readers. We give it in extenso:—

Towards the end of 1872, chance led to the discovery, in a very small Flemish village, of an old harpsichord, which, after it had been freed from the dust and cobwebs that covered it, its purchaser found was one of the most interesting and most perfect specimens ever sent out from the workshops of the celebrated Ruckers, of Antwerp.

Contrary to what is the case with certain harpsichords ornamented with exotic paintings, and mostly with little Japanese figures, the precious specimen in question alone bears the artistic stamp of our country. Who does not recognise a frankly Flemish work in the graceful gilt medallions which, surrounded by cartouches of coquettish tracery, and frames capriciously diversified, ornament the body and top of the instrument outside!

The inside of the top displays a landscape, severe and vigorous in colouring, of our Flemish school at its best period. The painter has represented a port in the north of Italy. Vessels and barks are sailing over a calm sea. Some are arriving, while the sails of others are visible in the distance. Sailors are playing at dice, while resting upon the beach. A beggar is importuning two Armenian merchants. A horseman is just disappearing at the end of a road, while a lighthouse, in a more or less ruinous condition, rises in the background. The picture is indeed the creation of a child of Antwerp, that queen of the Scheldt, whose commerce extended, thanks to navigation, then as now, all over the globe.

Above the landscape, in the left-hand corner, is an inscription in black letters, on a gold ground. It consists of the words: MVSICA DONVM DEI. The whole is surrounded by ornaments of the same colour.

The sounding-board, of incredibly thin deal, seems made of a single piece, so skilfully are the planks fitted to each other. Two centuries and a half have been unable to make them warp a hair's breadth. The board is covered with artistically painted flowers and fruit. To the left, a garland of roses, lilies, and other bright flowers surround the maker's trade-mark, a winged figure seated in profile. In has, however, its face turned full towards the spectator, and is playing the harp. On one side of it is a simple I, and, on the other, an R. It is of lead repoussé and gilt.

The keyboard is somewhat worn in the middle. The keys are ornamented in front with charming gilt carving, which reminds the spectator, at one and the same time, of the Renaissance, and, to some extent, of the three-lobed ornaments found in the rose-windows and window-shafts of the end of the XVth century.

The panels surrounding the keyboard are black, with gilt mosaic, in the style of the XVIIth century, and have a thin white line round them. Beneath the principal mosaic we read the following inscription, running, in black letters on a gilt ground, the entire length of the keyboard: JOANNES RVCKERS FECIT ANTVERPIÆ.

The date, 1627, is marked, in red Arabic figures, a little above the rose, on the sounding-board.

The lanières, pinked after the fashion of the time, are of copper, gilt. Two registers, acting upon two rows of jacks, project, by means of two keys, from near the lock, that is to say, from the exterior of the instrument, and to the right of the player. The front of these keys, also, is carved and gilt. The notes of the keyboard, fifty-three in number, form four octaves and a half, minus one note. The keyboard is not quite seventy-six centimetres in length.

The instrument rests upon an elegant leg, with charmingly delicate mouldings turned by the lathe. When the top is three quarters raised, the sight from a distance is something really marvellous. The spectator first perceives the delicious landscape with its gilt border. Then there is visible, in another tint, and surrounded by a gold band, the splendid sounding-board, which anyone might easily fancy was made of old leather, gilt and ornamented with flower-de-lis, such as was used for hangings in our Flemish residences and called Cordova Leather. Beneath this the cartouches, designed with such good taste, stand out upon a ground of red lake—the beautiful red à la Leys. Lastly, the slender supports lend the entire instrument a sort of diaphanous look, and cause it to appear as slim as the bird of which some one asserted that it seemed to have wings when it walked. Such a style of decoration is, in our opinion, better than a profuse and lavish display of carvings and incrustations.

Jean Ruckers must have made instruments larger in size, but he can never have manufactured any more charmingly elegant. Taking it all in all, the instrument in question is the harpsichord of some great lady, and is admirably adapted to a saloon containing principally furniture of a small and brilliant pattern.

One rare and, perhaps, unique fact is that the instrument has preserved unchanged its primitive form, for the reader is not ignorant that, as the range of the harpsichord was extended at the commencement of the XVIIIth century, those persons who possessed harpsichords of the old make, had them modified, adapting to them, in the higher parts, a whole supplementary compartment, which, by destroying the original outlines of the instruments, gave them an air of extreme heaviness and irregularity.

Such, in a word, is the magnificent harpsichord recently discovered in Flanders. A unique and complete specimen of the numerous instruments turned out by the Corporation of St Luke of Antwerp, it is undoubtedly destined to be a constant object of admiration for amateurs.* It will be photographed, and photographs of it will be published, together with an exhaustive notice of the Ruckers, firstly in the third volume of La Musique aux Pays Bas, now in the press, and then in the important work Les Restes de Notre Art National, issued, with such intelligent care, by M. Colinet. We must, however, say at once, that, despite the perfection to which the photographic art has attained, this reproduction will still be infinitely inferior to the original, which figures, by the side of a most curious clavichord, in the musicological collection of M. Edmond Vander Straeten.—Guide Musical.

The great house of Broadwood and Sons should immediately possess themselves of this treasure.

THE following anecdote is related concerning Boieldieu, whose centenary the city of Rouen is preparing to celebrate with great magnificence:—

"One day—when the future composer was seven years old, and a singing-boy in the choir—the organist of the Cathedral, whose name was Broche, called upon the father. 'My dear M. Boieldieu,' he said, 'your son possesses an extraordinary musical temperament.'—'Do you think so?'—'You are his father in the flesh; I want to be his father in art. Will you trust him to me?'—'Well, the fact is, we are not rich, and you charge highly for your lessons.'—'That is true as regards the rich, the ignorant, and fools, who study music as they study dancing and fencing,

* The lay-clerk to whom the harpsichord belonged informed us that he purchased it from an amateur at Antwerp, some fifty years ago. The said amateur had obtained it from another Antwerper. The genealogy of those who possessed the instrument does not extend further.

but your son shall be my pupil without your being called upon for a sou. He shall pay me later by saying to those who admire his talent—Broche was my first master. Do you accept?' 'I do, and we thank you.'—'No thanks, please. Rouen is the birthplace of Pierre Corneille and other great men. A composer is still wanting to her glory. I wish to present her with one.'"

The result of M. Broche's offer is known to all. His pupil wrote Jean de Paris, and La Dame Blanche. Among the noted Russian composers of the present day, three rejoice respectively in the names of Afanasieff; Tslhailkowsky; and Asantscheffsky. Yet not one of the three has written a Dame Blanche.

OCCASIONAL NOTE.

More than one dramatic work might be mentioned which admits of two different endings, or which has been played with two different endings, whether the variation be poetically admissible or not. In a version of Romeo and Juliet prepared with a view to tender-hearted audiences, Juliet comes to life just in time to prevent Romeo from committing suicide, and the happy lovers fall into one another's arms as the curtain comes down. We are assured, too, that a musical Othello exists, much older than Rossini's opera on the same subject, in which Othello is set right by Emilia immediately before instead of immediately after the point at which in Shakspere's tragedy he murders his wife. Thereupon he apologizes like a gentleman, embraces Desdemona, and joins her in a duet. Ambroise Thomas's opera of Mignon, however, is, as far as we know, the only stage work provided with no fewer than three endings. In the original, as presented to the French public, Mignon marries Wilhelm Meister. To Germans acquainted with Goethe's novel this dénoûement would, of course, have appeared absurd; so, for Germany, a new version was prepared, in which Mignon dies. It was interesting to see which of the two Mignons would be adopted by Mdme Nilsson in the triumphal tour which she has been making through Belgium—a country which occupies an intermediate position between France and Germany, and, according to circumstances, may have to count with either or with both. It appears from the Belgian newspapers, which during the last week have been lauding Mdme Nilsson in every possible key, that the Mignon thought most suitable to the Belgians and duly presented to them, is neither the original French nor the German version of the work, but a Belgian imitation of both, which may be seen with satisfaction alike by Germans and by Frenchmen. In the Belgian piece, Mignon, as the curtain falls, sinks into the arms of Wilhelm Meister, either to die, if the Germans present like to take that view of the incident; or to swoon away with a joy from which she will soon recover, if that be the French idea of what the dénoûement should be. Whichever the best of the three versions from a dramatic point of view, the Belgian version has hitherto met with most success; and the accounts in the Brussels papers of Mdme Nilsson's performance in the work, as neutralized for Belgium, are full of the most positive and enthusiastic praise.—Pall Mall Gazette.

FRENCH PLAYS AT THE OPERA COMIQUE.

Dear Mr Editor,—Last night I witnessed the production of Mdlle Dupare, comedy in four Acts, by M. Denayrouze, a pupil and follower of Alexandre Dumas fils, who is certainly a long way behind his master in the art of dramatic construction. There is a want of life and naturalness about the characters in Mdlle Dupare—they are mere dummies, in fact; and, had the comedy not been well played, the results would have been nil. Mdlle Kelly acted very well, with exception, occasionally, of a little formality in her elocution, and a want of ease and freedom in her acting, which will, perhaps, disappear after further representations. Mdme Baitteg, as the injured wife, played remarkably well. Both ladies were several times recalled. The acting of Mr. James (as the old Marquis) and that of Messrs Monti and Montlouis, was excellent; but no amount of good acting can invest with life such skeletons as M. Denayrouze has drawn. The outlines are there, but the filling up is left to the imagination of the spectator. Next week we are promised some representations by Mdlle Laura Gerard. I am, dear Mr Editor, yours faithfully, Ignace Gibsone.

CONCERTS VARIOUS.

The Aldermanbury Musical Society, founded only in February last, by a few city gentlemen, now numbers 200 voices. The first concert, which took place in the Cannon Street Hotel on Monday last, showed the rapid progress the society had made under the conductorship of Mr Edward Craig. The capital performance of the different choruses and glees proved the high musical intelligence of the members of the choir, and promises a good result for the future of the young society. The solo vocalists were Miss Marion Severn and Mr T. Ainsworth, and the pianist was Herr Lehmeyer, who played several pieces in excellent style.

Mr Aguilar's first performance of pianoforte music, for the present season, took place on Monday, when the following programme was gone through, to the evident satisfaction of the audience:—Caprice in D flat—Aguilar; Aréthuse (Melodie)—Aguilar; Allegro and Fugue (from Suite 2)—Handel; Sonata quasi Fantasia (Op. 27, No. 1) (Miss Kemball Cook, pupil of Mr Aguilar)—Beethoven; Abends Romance, Raff, and Etude in C—Rubinstein; "The stars are brightly beaming" (Transcription)—Aguilar; Sonata in E—Mendelssohn; Nachtstück and Novellette (in F) (Miss Kemball Cook)—Schumann; Rigoletto (Transcription)—Liszt; Two Melodies, Rêve and Aveu—Aguilar; Valse in A flat, Chopin, and Marche militaire—Aguilar.

The Musical Artists' Society held their fourth trial of new compositions on Saturday, April 17th, at the Royal Academy of Music, Tenterden Street, Hanover Square (by kind permission of the Committee of Management). We subjoin the programme:—

Sacred part-songs, "They whom we loved on earth,"—F. Westlake, "He giveth His beloved sleep"—Arthur O'Leary (sung by a select number of students of the Royal Academy of Music); Duo, in G, for pianoforte and violin (Mr Summers and Mr G. Palmer)—J. Lea Summers; Song, "Misfortune's dark unrest" (Miss Bessie Randal)—C. Gardner; Duet, "The sky is dark," and Trio, "Fear not, dearest" (from the MS. opera, Pillow of Roses) (The Misses Winnifred and Mr Hugh Arundel)—J. Parry Cole; Duo Concertante, for two pianofortes (Miss Ellen Day and Miss Bolton, pupil of Miss Day)—Charles E. Stephens; Part-song, "Look all around thee"—F. Westlake; Part-song, "Proud Maisie" (MS.)—Arthur O'Leary; Sonata, in F, for pianoforte and violin (Mr Thorne and Mr H. Holmes)—E. H. Thorne; Song, "There sits a bird on yonder tree" (Mr L. N. Parker)—Louis N. Parker; Duo, for pianoforte and violoncello (Miss Prescott and Mr Trust)—Oliveria Prescott (Student of the R. A. M.); Song, "I know my love loves me" (Miss Mary Davies, Welsh Choral Union scholar)—R. O'Leary Vinning; Part-song, "Under the maple tree"—H. Baumer.

Mr H. R. Eyers was the conductor, and the room was fully attended.

Mr Alfred Gilbert and Mdme Gilbert gave the first Chamber Concert of their present series at the Gallery of "The Society of British Artists," Suffolk Street, Pall Mall, on Monday evening, April 19th. The instrumentalists were—violin, Herr Straus; violoncello, Signor Pezze; pianoforte, Miss Ellen Day, Mr Charles E. Stephens, Mr Alfred Gilbert; and the vocalists, Mdme Gilbert, Mdme Osborne Williams, Mr Wilbye Cooper. The following programme, our readers may probably think, justifies Mr and Mdme Gilbert in "christening" their entertainment, "The Classics of the Pianoforte."

Trio in F (Op. 42), violin, violoncello, pianoforte (Herr Straus, Signor Pezze, Mr Alfred Gilbert)—Niels Gade; Duets, "In the Greenwood" and "The Gondola" (Mdme Gilbert and Mdme Osborne Williams)—H. Smart; Chaconne in G, Suite de pièces, pianoforte (Mr Alfred Gilbert)—Handel; Song, "O Beauteous Daughter of the Starry Race" (Mr Wilbye Cooper)—Beethoven; Aria, "Che vive amante," from the opera, Poro (Mdme Osborne Williams)—Handel; Preludium and Fuga in G minor, violin (Herr Straus)—J. S. Bach; Songs, "Lullaby" and "May Dew" (Mdme Gilbert)—Brahms and Sir Sterndale Bennett; Duo Brillante in E (Op. 19), pianoforte (Miss Ellen Day and Mr C. E. Stephens)—Charles E. Stephens; Trio, "Mi lasci o madre" (Mdme Gilbert, Mdme Osborne Williams, and Mr Wilbye Cooper)—Winter; Solo, Largo ed Allegro in F, and Gavotte, violoncello (Signor Pezze)—Benedetto Marcello and Geminiani; Song (by desire), "Oh ma charmante" (Mr Wilbye Cooper)—Sullivan; Grand Trio in B flat (Op. 99)—Schubert.

Hamburgh.—St Michael's Church was lately the scene of a grand performance of Bach's Passion Music. Herr Berunth presided over an efficient orchestra and choir, Herr Osterhold was at the organ, and Dr Bieber had his choir of boys. The solo parts were in the hands of Mdme Otto-Alvsleben, Mdlle Fides Keller, Herr Lederer, and Herr Hill. The local press bestow great praise upon the performance, especially the singing of Herr Hill and Mdme Otto-Alvsleben. The Fremdenblatt says:—"Mdme Otto Alvsleben is still fresh in the remembrance of our public. The artistic conception of the music allotted to her which this artist manifests on all occasions, leads us to place her among the first oratorio singers in Germany."

PROVINCIAL.

DUBLIN.—At the Gaiety Theatre Faust has been given by the Carl Rosa Company, to a very full house. Mr Fred. C. Packard made an excellent impression. Miss Rose Hersee looked charmingly as Marguerite, and both her singing and acting were artistic. In the spinning-wheel scene she was loudly applauded. The Mephistopheles of Mr Celli, and the Valentine of Mr A. Cook were especially good. Miss Annie Goodall did good service as Siebel, and Mrs. A. Cook as Martha.—The University Choral Society lately gave a concert in the Examination Hall of the College, in the presence of a crowded and distinguished audience.—Freeman's Journal.

MAIDENHEAD.—A correspondent writes us that the first concert of the Maidenhead Philharmonic Society took place on Thursday, April the 8th, under the conductorship of its founder, Herr Schultz. The programme began with Rossini's overture to La Gazza Ladra, and finished with Romberg's music (for solo, chorus, and orchestra) to Schiller's "Lay of the Bell." The performance, as a whole, was not unworthy of the composition nor incommensurate with the expense and trouble devoted to it. Herr Schultz had a select though a small orchestra at his disposal, well led by Herr Rosenthal, from Her Majesty's Opera, who, during the evening, played a violin solo, for which he was enthusiastically applauded.

STRATFORD.—A concert was given in the Town Hall on Monday evening, by the Lothbury Choral Society, under the direction of Mr Josiah Chippingdale, who, as well as the choir, gave his services in aid of the Library Fund for the Church of England Association. Part-songs and glees by Mendelssohn, Henry Leslie, Henry Smart, Fesca, T. Cooke, J. L. Hatton, G. A. and Walter Macfarren were sung in perfection. Miss Henman and Mrs Baynes gave in excellent style the two-part song, "I would that my love," and Miss Mackway, in Bishop's "Should he upbraid," pleased very much. Mr F. G. Haig, who possesses a good bass voice, sang "The Wolf." One of the attractions of the evening was the pianoforte playing of Mrs Josiah Chippingdale, of the Royal Academy of Music, who gave Sir Julius Benedict's Fantasia on Welsh Melodies, Stephen Heller's La Truite, and a Tarentelle by W. Macfarren (encored). The performance of Mrs Chippingdale was rewarded with warm and deserved applause. Mr J. Chippingdale conducted in musicianly style.

DUBLIN.—Sir Robert Stewart has delivered his concluding lecture of the series on "keyed string instruments." The Examination Hall was crowded to the very doors, and the lecture and musical illustrations were listened to with the greatest attention and manifest interest. An interesting portion of the proceedings was the performance of Miss Adeline Wheeler, the young pianist whose playing at the "College Choral Society's Concert" was so highly spoken of. The orchestral work with which the lecture concluded was Mendelssohn's Concerto in G minor (composed for Birmingham in 1837), Miss Wheeler taking the pianoforte part. Sir Robert Stewart and the Academy of Music—says the Irish Times—may well be complimented on having given to art so talented and promising a student. Miss Wheeler, though scarcely more than a child in years, has passed the age when she might be talked of as a "prodigy"—infant prodigies seem going out of fashion, by the way. She is an earnest, intelligent, hard-working girl, has excellent opportunities, and the best possible instruction, and there can be little doubt that a highly successful career is before her.

LIVERPOOL.—Mr Carl Rosa's Company began a week's engagement at the Alexandra Theatre on Monday evening. This company—writes the Daily Post—is the only one which pretends to give an adequate representation of English opera; and with what success their efforts have been crowned these columns have more than once borne witness. Mr Rosa has displayed an enterprise which is only now beginning to have its reward. Selecting the best talent to be found, he has organized a company which has presented English opera in a manner which leaves little to be desired; and hitherto, on each succeeding visit, the company has risen in popular favour. Martha was chosen for the opening night, for the appearance of a new tenor in the part of Lionello, Mr Fred. C. Packard, who, if we may judge from the warm, almost enthusiastic, applause which he received on Monday evening, will be a most valuable acquisition to the troupe. Besides possessing a good and well-cultivated voice, Mr Packard both sings and acts like a true artist. In Miss Rose Hersee, who appeared as Martha, an old favourite was welcomed. Her voice was as sweet and fresh as ever; her acting more finished and sprightly, and her phrasing very perfect. She rendered "The Last Rose of Summer" with exquisite taste and sweetness, and had to repeat it. Miss Annie Goodall achieved a great success as Nancy. Mr Celli was Plumkett, and Mr Aynsley Cooke Sir Tristram. The choruses went well, and the orchestra could scarcely have been surpassed. At the end of the fourth act the principal singers were called before the curtain.

CRANBROOK.—The last concert for the season in connection with the Literary Institution took place at the Parochial Hall. The gem of the evening was a pianoforte solo, Andante and Rondo Capriccioso (Mendelssohn), played by Miss Borrough, who received an ovation of applause. The Misses Relf sang "The Elfin Call," and were encored. The Rev. C. Crowden, M.A., proposed a vote of thanks "to the ladies and gentlemen who have assisted at the entertainments during the winter, especially to Mr Langley and Mrs Joyce, who had done so much to promote a taste for good music in the parish." This was cheerfully accorded, and "God save the Queen" concluded the programme. Mr Langley conducted, and Mrs Joyce played the accompaniments.

BRENTWOOD (ESSEX).—A concert was given, in aid of St George's New Infant School Fund, by Mr J. Henry Pollard's Choral Society, at the Granville Hall, on Wednesday evening, April 7. The principal vocalists were Miss Mary Duval, Miss Richardson, and Mr Henry Guy, of the Royal Academy of Music. The instrumentalists were Mr Henry Morley (violin solo and leader), of the Italian Opera and Sacred Harmonic Society, and the following amateurs: George G. Brown, Esq. (second violin); Gilderoy Scott, Esq. (viola); George Foster Cooke, Esq. (violoncello); and Pullam E. Evans, Esq. (contra basso). The first part of the programme consisted of Mendelssohn's cantata, Hymn of Praise. The second part was miscellaneous, and included a Grand Trio by Beethoven, for violin, violoncello, and piano (Messrs H. Morley, George Foster Cooke, and J. H. Pollard); "Réponse à la Méditation de Gounod," for violin, violoncello, and piano (Messrs Morley, Cooke, and Pollard)—Berthold Tours; a violin solo, "Fantasia on Scotch airs" (Mr Henry Morley)—Sainton; and several popular vocal pieces, all of which were listened to with evident pleasure by the audience.

WESTERHAM.—Among the many numerous efforts which have been made of late years by well-intentioned people to improve the tastes for healthy amusement—writes the Sussex Express—and at the same time to draw the bond of union between the inhabitants a little closer, by furnishing them with the opportunity of spending an evening together occasionally, upon mutual terms of peace and goodwill, none, perhaps, have deserved greater recognition from their neighbours than the members of the Westerham Harmonic Society; and no one is, probably, better acquainted with the requirements of a mixed audience than Mr Francis Howell, the society's able conductor. At the last concert given in the Public Hall, a selection from Judas Maccabæus formed the first part of the programme, and a miscellaneous selection followed. The choruses in the oratorio went very satisfactorily, thanks to the judicious training of Mr Howell. The principal airs were carefully rendered; Mrs Dumaresq in "Pious orgies," Mr Horace Buck in "Arm, arm ye brave," and Miss S. Lockyer in "O liberty," calling forth the applause of the audience. The band, under the leadership of Mr J. Stannard, were on their "best behaviour," and the selection altogether pleased greatly. There were so many pieces in the second part of the programme that we cannot find space to enumerate them; but we must not omit a word of commendation, for the way in which Mr F. Ogden sang Mr Wilford Morgan's "My sweetheart when a boy," nor for the style in which Mr Henry Taylor (pupil of Mr Howell) played a flute solo, and Mr T. Chapman gave the song, "Speed my bark" (all three encored).

CORK.—Miss Bella M'Carty's concert came off in the Munster Hall, and was a great success. Every part of the house was well filled by a discriminating audience. As a musical entertainment—says the Daily Herald—nothing like it has been heard in the Munster Hall for some years. All we had said of Miss M'Carty's musical abilities was more than justified by her performance. Her first appearance was in a piece by Mendelssohn, which she rendered with delicacy and expression. In reply to a warm encore the fair débutante played Thalberg's arrangement of "Home, sweet home." In her execution of this piece she quite enraptured the audience, who accorded her an ovation her great talents richly merited. The young lady improved in her subsequent performances, and those who heard her could not withhold the opinion that she was destined to fill a leading part in the world of music. With Miss M'Carty were associated two other instrumentalists, Mdlle Vailliant (violinist), and Herr Elsner (violoncellist). The vocalists were Miss Duval, who sang, "Only for One," and was warmly encored; the "Little Maid of Arcadee" (Sullivan), was also a great success, and, in reply to a peremptory encore, she gave "The Meeting of the Waters;" Mr Pearson, who gave "Once again," and, in reply to a warm encore, "Alice, where art thou?" and our townsman, Mr J. Sullivan, who was never in better voice. He sang Handel's "Revenge, Timotheus cries," and in response to a warm call gave "Honour and Arms." We cannot conclude without expressing our admiration of the manner in which Mr John W. M'Carty conducted the performance, which, in a musical sense, left nothing to be desired, and gave the utmost satisfaction.

MAD. PATTI IN VIENNA.

"La Patti nous est revenue plus Patti que jamais!" Such was the greeting lately pronounced by W. von Lenz, the ever young Nestor of Patti-enthusiasts, on the arrival of the lady in St Petersburgh. These specimens of stylistic millinery, of which the French feuilletonistes have so large a supply at command, scarcely lend themselves to translation. A Viennese critic who sees Mad. Patti at the beginning of every spring, experiences, despite the joy in his heart, a feeling of embarrassment in his pen. What can be said new about Patti?—what is more sterile for the critic than perfection? It would be different were we to see her in new characters. The most familiar individuality becomes new for us in each new part. But, this season, as previously, only Mad. Patti's old and long familiar repertory has been repeated. The monopoly of the Imperial Operahouse on the one hand, and the narrow limits of a star-engagement, with only a small company, on the other, prevent the performance, at our Komische Oper, of those more important lyric dramas for which Mad. Patti has of late manifested an especial partiality. On the other hand, such operas as La Gazza Ladra, Les Diamants de la Couronne, &c., cannot be got up in Vienna, which is to be regretted, because every new part sustained by Mad. Patti must be welcome. So, we have Lucia, La Sonnambula, &c. These operas have been played again and again, till we are tired of them. But are we less charmed with Mad. Patti than we were two, or three, or twelve years ago? No; and for a renewal of an old pleasure fresh gratitude is due. We ought not to tire of extolling such a combination of natural gifts with artistic culture.

If Adelina Patti always sings the same, why should we not always write the same—if only because nothing new can be written? Her almost childlike appearance; the silvery tone of her voice; the effortless ease of her bravura, are still hers, untouched by time. But what, side by side with these qualities, invariably captivates anew is her innate sense of beauty. It is not always that virtuosity springs from a truly musical nature, and the virtuoso who has hastened, for more than a decennium, from triumph to triumph, loses, as a rule, the simplicity of musical sentiment, becoming more subtle and artificial, in the endeavour to make up for that sense of the Beautiful which is lost. With Patti there is no trace of such an influence. She does nothing without a reason. Even in moments of the greatest passion she never oversteps the strict line of the Musically Beautiful? She always sings in tune and in time; respects the text of the composer; indulges in no tremolo; and never exaggerates. Her acting retains its charming truthfulness to nature; the feeling of satiety with old parts never driving her to the system of the "clever and novel" at any price.

The two most successful performances were those of La Traviata and Don Pasquale. Don Pasquale, with its abundance of joyous melody, was a genuine treat. Patti's Norina is so marked by grace and sprightliness, that we cannot be angry with the fascinating coquet. In the scene where Pasquale deplores the humiliation to which he has been exposed, the compassionate look with which, unremarked, Norina glances towards her victim, is an exquisite touch. For a moment, ashamed, and sorry for Pasquale; but her ruling object is to call Ernesto her own, and she recovers herself with a smile, which can only signify—"Crepa!"

Milan.—The Teatro Dal Verme has been opened with L'Africaine. The performance on the first night was a quasi-failure, owing to the want of sufficient rehearsal.—The statement in certain papers, that Verdi is writing a new work for next season at the Scala, is devoid of truth. An opera by Josse, La Lega, which was to have been produced last season, and another by Gomez, may be considered as certain; as also one by a composer from Trieste, whose name has not transpired.

Brussels.—The deep impression produced by Christine Nilsson has grown deeper with every performance. Public and critics are equally delighted. The Guide Musical, speaking of her performance in Faust, says: "From the second half of Act II. it is nothing but one long triumph, and we can applaud without reserve. "The enthusiasm was great, and it was only right that it should be so. What Mad. Nilsson offers us is art in all its truth and all its sincerity." The society for the Encotragement of Philological Science has just presented M. Gevaert with a medal of honour for his book on the History and Theory the Music of Antiquity.

MR FREDERIC SULLIVAN IN TRIAL BY JURY.

"Mr F. Sullivan's impersonation of the learned and impressionable Judge deserves a special word of praise for its quiet and natural humour."—Times.

"But the greatest 'hit' was made by Mr F. Sullivan, whose blending of official dignity, condescension, and, at the right moment, extravagant humour, made the character of the Judge stand out with all requisite prominence, and added much to the interest of the piece."—Telegraph.

"The hits of the piece are Mr Fred. Sullivan's Judge, 'with a song' (and such a song! Easy-going music and first-rate words, of which Mr Frederic Sullivan does not allow the audience to miss a single syllable in four or five verses.) . . ."—Punch.

"Mr F. Sullivan is the Judge, and he is admirable. His attitude and manner are life-like, and his get-up is unexceptionable. The contrast between his grave bearing and the absurdity of his situation is a treat."—Hour.

"Mr F. Sullivan was the amorous Judge, and, in the words of the piece, 'a good judge too.'"—Post.

"Mr F. Sullivan played the Judge with real and unexaggerated humour."—Standard.

"It is well done throughout, and Mr Sullivan was especially good as the Judge."—Advertiser.

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

Dear Sir,—The opening of the operatic campaign leads me back to the last season, when I had the privilege of addressing you a letter, acknowledged in your impression of the 18th July, with the intimation that it had reached too late for insertion that week. The unostentatious prospectus issued by the Covent Garden management, will, I am sure, have created a good impression. This year, contrary to usual precedent (save last year), the season was announced to be ushered in with a "chef-d'œuvre," quickly followed, at present, by four more; and it is to be hoped, for the sake of our musical taste, that no comments will again be made in respect of the first masterpiece announced for next week, such as led me to address you in the letter referred to above. On perusing the list of performers in the magnificent posthumous work of Meyerbeer, I observe the trio is again as complete as it can possibly be, considering that the original Covent Garden heroine has left its boards. It is a most agreeable surprise to see the great maestro's chosen "Vasco" again up and doing, that worthy representative not having been even included in the prospectus, much to my regret. Whatever has caused this change, matters little, since a benefit is derived from the present arrangement. To give this work twice or thrice this season, as is the rule every year, is the best means of getting it dismissed altogether. Frequent performances will rank it with the Huguenots, besides impressing listening minds with that noble harmony peculiar to the composer in this opera. It is also satisfactory that at last we are to be favoured with some of Wagner's productions, though I fear the verdict of the public. If Meyerbeer's operas are styled ponderous, and delusively said to depend chiefly on scenic effects, what will be the fate of Wagner's works? I am, dear Sir, your obedient servant,

O. L.

FAIR LILY OF THE DALE.

(Copyright.)

Fair lily of the valley, nearly hid in leaves of green,
Why dost thou hide thy beauty, wouldst thou rather be unseen?
Dost thou fear to meet rude gazers that thou lookest on the ground
While thy sister flowers are smiling in sunshine all around?
Were it not for the sweet perfume thou breathed on the gale
We scarce should heed thy presence, fair lily of the dale.

Sweet lily of the valley, give heed now while I tell,
How, with a charming gracefulness, thou droop'st thy snowy bell.
Thy form has perfect beauty, thou art simple yet refined,
And Art with all its science can but imitate thy kind—
But cannot match thy symmetry. We know the story goes
That e'en the wisest king was not arrayed like one of those.

My lily of the valley, even yet we will not part,
For I will gently gather thee, and place thee near my heart;
And while thou yieldest up thy life, sweet lily, teach me how
To live a life of usefulness, and die beloved as thou.
So may thy silent teaching make me heed the present hour,
And let me learn true wisdom from a sweet and gentle flower.

BELGIAN MUSICIANS IN ITALY.*

Brussels, 23rd December, 1874.

SIR,—In rendering you an account of the mission to Italy with which I was charged by you, I by no means propose writing a musicological dissertation. My object is simply to add to the dates and facts already acquired for History the contingent of my new discoveries. History is formed of successive aggregations. No one can flatter himself with having said the last word concerning so vast and so complicated a science. The light must burst forth insensibly from the clouds which obscure it. A multitude of precious archives in the Peninsula having been destroyed or scattered by the revolutions of the XVth century, patient seekers are obliged to have recourse to indirect proofs—to inductive documents. It was precisely the epoch when our valiant Flemings went to take possession of all the positions which skilful Italian masters did not dare dispute with them. They implanted in the country, under very varied conditions, their profound experience and their vast knowledge. Tinctoris, for example, did not direct, as people have hitherto believed, the musical chapel of the King of Naples. The greatest theorist of the XVth century was nothing more than an humble lay-clerk, or singing man; and, among the twenty-one artists, not including the soprani, who formed the vocal staff of the chapel, his name occupies only the twelfth place. Impartial history demands this rectification founded on the most irrefutable documents. I visited Italy to seek the truth. As singing canon, Tinctoris enjoyed aparently some lucrative prebends. I endeavoured to discover what were the favours with which, if we are to believe him, the sovereign so generously gratified him. I found only a cloth costume, given him in 1479, according to an ancient usage, followed, also, in the Netherlands. I was enabled to take a copy of the original letter in which Ferdinand of Arragon charged him with enlisting lay-clerks in Flanders and elsewhere.

Although he held a professorship of belles-lettres, erat in humanis, Tinctoris was so distrustful of his own capabilities that he sometimes commissioned his friends to carefully revise his writings. The celebrated didactician, Gafori, boasts of having enjoyed this honour, and takes advantage of it to exalt his own merit. So great was the learning of Tinctoris that many writers of the Peninsula, and, among others, Pittoni, do not hesitate claiming for themselves our glorious fellow-countryman, and making of him a Neapolitan musician. I will prove elsewhere that he was of Flemish origin, and that his Latinized name corresponded exactly to that of De Verver. He learned, moreover, his art from a Fleming, Goedendach, alias Bonadies. The list of lay-clerks attached to the Royal chapel of Naples comprises, also, the name of another illustrious Belgian, Bernard Ycart, who is named eleventh, and received, like his learned colleague, a cloth costume, in 1479.

On seeing artists of such value banished, so to speak, to the background in a musical institution of repute, we ask ourselves what must have been the talent of those who fulfilled more important functions. Well, not one of these persons has left the faintest trace in musical annals, a proof, in my opinion, that distinctions were due to favour rather than to merit. Or, perhaps, they were due, also, to length of service. After Tinctoris and Ycart, the Fleming Jean de Maque (De Maeq?), in his character of chapelmaster to the Viceroy Medina-Celi, sustained at Naples the musical reputation of Belgium. His works caused Cerone, who was a good judge, to call him "the best instrumentalist and composer in the city."

The celebrated composer Gaspard, whose family name was Van Weerbeke, shone at Milan in the XVth century. Baini designated him a musico famoso, an appellation fully justified by his works, manuscript and printed. He enjoyed, at the refined court of the Sforzi, an amount of esteem, so to speak, unlimited, and, from simple lay-clerk, rose to the important functions of chapelmaster, after fulfilling a confidential mission entrusted to him, in 1498, by Duke Luigi Sforza. The object of the mission was the partial reconstitution of the Duke's musical chapel by the aid of artists borrowed from the churches of the Low Countries. Flemish lay-clerks were preferred on account of the solidity of their voice and the extent of their musical knowledge. I found some unpublished compositions of Gaspard's, which possess very great interest. They formed part of a precious manuscript of the commencement of the XVIth century. In it are some unknown works of nine other illustrious Flemish masters. I have written a detailed account of this superb collection. Gaspard had under his orders at Milan a prodigiously talented fellow-countryman, from Bruges, who has left, however, only insignificant vestiges in musical annals. This was Jean Cordier, called Gallicus. He drew, says the official historian of the Court, two hundred ducats a month. The lay-clerks of St Mark's, Venice, received only fifty. In addition to this, Cordier enjoyed every year a six months' leave of absence to visit his family. This great favour was granted him in 1496.

About the same time there appeared at the sumptuous court of Ferrara a musician of an imposing figure and of an agreeable physiognomy: di statura longa e uomo bello. He sang bass, and came from the cathedral of Antwerp. This modest artist was no other than Josquin Deprès, proclaimed unanimously the most clever composer of his time. Some ten years ago I had the happiness to find an attractive portrait of him engraved after his bust, which stood, previous to the period of the iconoclasts, in the church of Sainte Gudule at Brussels. The reigning Princes of Italy inspired between their respective musical establishments a noble and lively emulation, by which the art profited. Each strove to possess as his lay-clerks the most eminently talented musicians.—I discovered in a series of documents of the highest value some curious lines, establishing a sort of parallel between the illustrious Josquin and a famous German composer, attached, like him, to the Court of Ferrara. "The latter," it is said in them, "besides revealing a more sociable nature, produces more frequently new things; the former composes infinitely better, but applies himself to work as it suits his caprice, instead of doing so when the sovereign requests him."

Now we have the installation, totally unexpected, of the celebrated Antoine Brumel as Ducal chapelmaster. This great artist, who long passed as the emulator of Josquin, previously boasted of no other biography than the mention of his name in Guillaume Crétin's Déploration on the death of Okeghem. Among other conditions of his engagement figure a gratuity of two hundred ducats, a salary of one hundred ducats, and free lodgings. The same year, he printed at Venice a collection of motets which must have enchanted the Court of Ferrara, for his works are the object of the highest encomiums on the part of his contemporaries. Even to-day they are highly vaunted. Ambros does not hesitate to say that he admires in them enchanting clearness and ideal beauty. The Duke of Ferrara appointed Brumel for life. But the versatile humour of the artist soon rendered this stipulation illusory.

We see every moment lay-clerks setting out from the Court of the Dukes d'Este for Flanders, not only to seek there musical compositions emanating from the great masters of that privileged country, but to enlist fresh and trained voices. The catalogue, drawn up by a certain Barthélemi de Flandre, of the artists at liberty in the Netherlands at the end of the XVth century is a most precious document with reference to the state of musical matters in our nation.

There arrived, one after the other, at Ferrara, to become acclimatized there, the eminent musicians named: Gisbert Batenberg, Pierre de Bruxelles, Jean Havic, François de Louvain, Jean Abbié, Pierre Bréda, and Jean-Marie Maryc, the last two being qualified as "great composers," and charged with arranging in the chapel books the counterpoint at sight, a proof that the Italians were then incapable of extemporizing properly the harmonic parts. A short time subsequent to this enlistment of recruits, Pierre Maron, one of the most expert lay-clerks of the day, brought, da Brusselles in Fiandra, five supplementary musicians, namely: two soprani, a contralto, a tenor, and a bass. We meet, also, at the same court, Cyprien de Rore, of whom I shall speak presently, and Orland de Lassus, who went there as a visitor, in 1585, surrounded by all the honours due to his enormous celebrity. Both he and his master, William of Bavaria, displayed, as we learn from two interesting letters, considerable enthusiasm for the music of the Ferrara chapel generally, and for the productions of his countryman, Il Divino Rore, more particularly.

At Venice, a Fleming, Pierre de Fossà, probably Vander Gracht, was summoned, about the end of the XVth century, to fill the functions of director of the maîtrise at St Mark's. He began by shining there as a lay-clerk. His reputation as a clever composer then increased to such an extent, that he was placed in the first rank. An author of the time names him, metaphorically, "A disciple of Apollo, and a favourite of the Muses."

(To be continued.)

ZARÉ THALBERG.

(From the "Sunday Times.")

Very seldom has a debûtante secured a more emphatic success than did Mdlle Zaré Thalberg on Saturday night. The opera selected was Don Giovanni, and the character chosen for the young artist to make her first appearance upon the stage was that most engaging of rustic maidens, Zerlina. From first to last Mdlle Thalberg had it all her own way, since, after the first few notes had fallen from her lips, the success of the young singer was assured. Mdlle Thalberg confronted her judges with an amount of self-possession rarely witnessed in one so young, and her acting neither showed symptoms of awkwardness, nor want of training. Stagey the young prima donna most decidedly is not, and the admixture of timidity and confidence in her demeanour, belonging essentially to herself, lent an additional attribute of grace and spontaneity to the assumption. In fact, in seeing Mdlle Zaré Thalberg, we beheld the ideal Zerlina of Mozart. As with her acting, so with her singing, Mdlle Thalberg was careful to make no undue effort for the sake of effect, contenting herself rather with singing in an easy unaffected manner, with a nice discrimination between the ostentation of simplicity and that of self-reliance. Mdlle Thalberg possesses a pure soprano voice, round and velvety as to tone, and of equal timbre throughout the entire register. From such faults as the tremolo or vibrato, the singer is perfectly free, and, indeed, her entire performance may be epitomised as being natural, artless, and captivating. The duet and the two airs were unanimously encored, and repeated with increased effect.

Christine Nilsson and Charity.

La Société protectrice de l'Enfance ayant sollicité le concours de Mdme Nilsson pour un concert de bienfaisance vient de recevoir de cette éminente artiste la lettre suivante :—

"Permettez-moi de m'inscrire pour la somme de cinq cents francs sur la liste des protecteurs de votre œuvre, dont le but est aussi moral que charitable, et croyez aux regrets que j'éprouve de ne pouvoir donner un concert pour venir plus efficacement en aide à votre société. Agréez, etc.

"Signé : CHRISTINE NILSSON-ROUZAUD."

En têmoignage de sa reconnaissance, le comité des dames patronnesses s'est empressé de faire parvenir à la grande artiste un magnifique bouquet en même temps que le conseil d'administration la nommait, par acclamation, membre protecteur de l'œuvre.—Indépendance Belge.

GOTHA.—August Langert's opera, Des Sängers Fluch, has been revived under the personal direction of the composer. It was very successful.

NAPLES.—The manager of the Teatro Mercadante has made Signora Cosmelli a present of a gold medal ornamented with pearls, in recognition of her services during the past season.

BERLIN.—Rubinstein's new opera, Die Maccabäer, is to be produced immediately at the Royal Operahouse. The composer is himself to direct the last rehearsals and the first performance; after which Eckert will resume the conductor's bâton.—The principal feature at the last concert of the Berlin Sinfoniecapelle, under the direction of Herr von Brenner, was a new Symphony in A by Herr Noskowski.

WAIFS.

Mdlle Thalberg made her second appearance as Zerlina on Tuesday night, and achieved another unqualified success. We are glad to see that a proper course is being followed in the management of this very promising débutante. She has charmed everybody in a part which suits her to perfection, and there is no reason why for some time longer she should not go on playing it. The "prospective arrangements" show that Mr Gye is alive to this fact, and will take advantage of it by guiding the young lady's further course with a caution proportioned to the interests at stake.—Daily Telegraph.

Il n'y a pas que les heureux et les riches quê le passage de Mme Nilsson aura réjouis.—Les déshérités de la fortune se souviendront aussi de son nom : Mme Nilsson vient de faire parvenir à M. Nélis, président de la Société protectrice de l'Enfance, un don de cinq cents francs.—Chronique de Bruxelles.

The death is announced of Madame Schott, the widow of Her Franz Philipp Schott, late mayor of the city of Mayence, and head of the great firm of Schott frères, of that city. Madame Schott was in her 54th year.

The military band of the Scots Fusilier Guards are engaged for a fortnight's tour in Ireland, next month, under the direction of Mr J. P. Clarke. If their corps of Highland Pipers were to appear, they would "astonish the natives."

The Sacred Harmonic Society announces two extra performances to take place after the termination of the Subscription Season. The oratorios selected for the two occasions are St Paul and Israel in Egypt, which are becoming more and more attractive.

The first and second numbers of a new compilation, bearing the title of The Australian Musical Magazine, has been published at Melbourne by the new firm of Nicholson and Ascherberg. Each number contains fourteen pieces for voice and piano, of varied interest, from original sources. The price for Australia is low, viz., 1s. 6d. a number. A third edition of the first issue is already in print.

The death is announced, in Paris, of M. Alphonse Royer, formerly director of the French Opera, at the age of seventy-two. Early in life, under the Restoration, he turned his attention to literature, and finally adopted the drama. He was first manager of the Odéon, and afterwards of the Opera. In 1862 he gave up that position and became Inspector-General of the Fine Arts. At the fall of the Empire he was deprived of his post. He published several books, comedies, and French versions of Italian Operas, for the Theatre in the Rue Lepelletier.

ADELINA PATTI.—Our Vienna correspondent writes that this distinguished artist has appeared at the Opéra Comique in Luisa Miller, La Sonnambula, and La Traviata, with all the éclat that usually attends upon her rentrée in that city. On Easter Sunday she was engaged to sing at a concert in Pesth, when the receipts were upwards of a thousand pounds. Before leaving St Petersburg the accomplished prima donna was presented by the Emperor with a magnificent bracelet, composed of large sapphires and diamonds, made expressly to match with the splendid diadem presented to her by the opera subscribers on the occasion of her benefit.

Some 30 or 40 years ago a playbill announcing the performance of three or even four pieces, slight in construction, but with a powerful cast, was deemed a sign of very fair entertainment. Englishmen then adapted from the French as readily, or even more so, than they do now; though the exact source of their plots was less frequently discovered, or even inquired after, than in those days, when our theatrical world has its eyes as steadily fixed on the stage of Paris as on that of London. Thirty years ago the Haymarket, save when some piece of exceptional weight was brought out, did not inaptly reflect the Gymnase, as it flourished under its old name, the Théâtre de Madame, with the late M. Eugène Scribe as its principal author. Something approaching to the old programmes may still be found in Paris, while in London they seem to have vanished without leaving a trace. This week, however, we are reminded of their existence by the publication of a playbill of the old-fashioned stamp at the Princess's Theatre.

SHAKSPERE MEMORIAL THEATRE.—A meeting was held yesterday at Mr Graves' Fine Art Gallery, Pall Mall, in aid of the movement to build a theatre to the memory of Shakspere at Stratford-on-Avon. The chair was taken by Mr D. Swinbourne, who explained the origin of the movement, and stated that it was proposed to have a performance at Drury Lane Theatre, in aid of the Fund, of "As You Like It," with an exceptionally strong cast. Mr Gruneisen said that a few years ago a committee was formed to collect subscriptions for erecting a statue to Shakspere, but the whole thing had collapsed. However, the sum of £1,200 had been collected, and, after expenses had been deducted, between £400 and £500 remained in hand. He had no doubt that if application were made to Mr Cousins, the trustee of that fund, his consent would be obtained to the application of that money to the purposes of this memorial. It was accordingly decided that such application should be made, and the meeting then proceeded to discuss some details of the Drury Lane performance.

Mdlle Zarg Thalberg, has been presented by Mr Gye, with a splendid gold watch and chain.

Herr Schuberth has returned from the continent, after fulfilling his engagements in Hamburgh and elsewhere, where he met with his accustomed success.

We have received from the well-known firm of D. B. James and Co. a very admirable photograph of the late regretted Mr Limpus, Principal and founder of the London College of Organists.

The first pianist who played the late Sterndale Bennett's Maid of Orleans publicly in the "New World," was Master Henry Walker, a pupil of Mr F. B. Jewson's, in our Royal Academy of Music.

Music Copyrights.—The sale of Music Plates and Copyrights of Messrs. Cramer and Co., the eminent publishers of Regent Street which has just taken place, under the direction of Messrs. Puttick and Simpson, included many popular compositions. We append a few of the more important lots, together with the prices, which in some cases were much higher than was anticipated. Lot 103. Cooper's Introduction to the Organ, £234 (A. Mills). 111. Sullivan's "Light of the World," £271 (Ditto). 170. Blumenthal's "When we are parted," £87 (Metzler). 279.
